Cupid is as old as mankind. But many of the wedding customs to celebrate his triumphs have changed considerably because of the car.

Take a typical wedding procession today—a caravan of cars following the bridal couple with blasting horns. This is the modern version of the old French custom called a "charivaree" during which the newlyweds were "serenaded" under the nuptial chambers with a hooting and howling boisterous enough to be heard in the next prefecture.

The business of tying old shoes to the back of the car has an amusing origin. In merrie olde England, the father of the bride presented his new son-in-law with one of her shoes to symbolize the transfer of his authority. The groom promptly conked his beloved over the head with the heel—to make her cognizant of this change immediately!

Many people today load the couple's car with cakes and sweets as they depart on their honeymoon. The ancient Greeks really started this when they poured flour and sweetmeats over the bride and groom to wish them an abundance of life's goodies.

And talking about honeymoons—they started way back when a man had to capture a bride. He took her to a hide-out while the parental wrath subsided.

The honeymoon today is still a withdrawal, but because of the car, it is often a mobile meandering with Cupid planning the itinerary.

The best time to select truly unusual Christmas gifts and greetings is during your vacation travels. Now that many of us have started planning our summer trips, here are some ideas you might like to consider.

Every region of our country is noted for some distinctive handicraft. In the southern highlands, for instance, you'll find exquisite hand-loomed ties, scarves and aprons. Or hand-carved wooden sculptures and table accessories.

The southwest's Indian reservations offer unique silver jewelry, baskets and leather goods. From Maine to California, you can find distinctive regional canned delicacies, packaged to symbolize the state. I've seen early American wooden buckets filled with New England's edible delights and a huge Texas boot filled with Mexican-type table treats that would be welcome anywhere.

Items like these are not only generally unavailable in your hometown, but cost much more when purchased far from their origins.

The most novel Christmas "card" I receive each year is a mimeographed travelogue from a family. It recounts their experiences for the entire year, highlighting all the places they visited. Even gossip about mutual friends met on the way, is included. It's a unique and personal family adventure story.

Why not get a head-start on the Christmas spirit during the summer—especially since it actually costs less that way!

Wood Fibers Help Crank Your Car

About the only wood left in the modern automobile is so completely out of sight it is rarely seen, even by a garage mechanic. A car's battery contains an average of 50 thin wooden wafers—separators—that keep negative and positive plates from touching.

For many years in hundreds of millions of batteries, Douglas Fir separators have been used with proved success. But, since only top quality clear wood can be used because separators have to be absolutely flawless, a great deal of this prime Douglas Fir has been wasted because the best separator-quality wood is found only near the outer part of the 200- to 400-year-old trees. Even a tiny crack makes a separator worthless.

Now, a new way has been found to utilize all the clear, straight-grained wood from a Douglas Fir log, and to produce separators of uniform quality for even less money. The new material, called Evanite, is made from the same top-quality Douglas Fir from which conventional separators are sliced. Tiny chips of wood are cooked, formed into a sheet of interwoven wood fibers, then dried and cut into separators—all in a continuous operation. The new separators are perfectly uniform and better than natural wood.

Thus through modern science and more efficient use of one of our natural resources has come a better product for less money.
