WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10, 1867.

(From Dickens's All the Year Round.)

SOMEBODYS ESCAPE.

In the old town of Limerick are many fine houses, built when it was thought that the town would stretch out by Clare's, instead of going as it did. There is Back Clare street, built of handsome private houses, which were afterwards let and sub-let cheap to lodgers—many of the lower class of trades-people. It was in one of these houses that a reduced gentlewoman—Miss Sally Carmody—lived, in or about the year 1761. There was a deal of French money sent over in those times, and some, it was thought, appropriated it to their own purposes.

Frank Arthur even, when he was building Arthur's Quay, was accused of having got some. I am quite sure this was untrue; but the story was believed because, you see, in those days it was thought such a important thing for a Catholic to build a whole quay! Three times, they say, he was on the point of being hanged; but the Earl of Limerick saved him. However this might be, Frank Arthur, being considered mighty "uppish" (that was the word) for a Catholic, was suspected; and not himself alone, but all who were known to be connected with him.—Arthur's wife was better born than himself, and poor Miss Sally Carmody was a cousin of hers, and well known as such. So she, good old lady, was under suspicion also.

Miss Sally being, as I said, reduced, was obliged to take in needle work to support herself. She was very skillful at her needle, and numbers of fine ladies used to mount the stairs to her lodgings to entrust her with work they were particular about. One would think there could be nothing very dangerous in this poor gentlewoman. Still being related to Arthur's wife, she was watched, and knew it. Above all, she lived in constant dread of a fellow lodger, who occupied the rooms on the ground floor, immediately below her. This woman, who followed the calling of clear-starcher, was an acrid, close communicative little body—very industrious, but very odd in her ways. She was what the neighbors called "a bitter Protestant;" consequently, she was employed by all the Protestant ladies of Limerick, and was, moreover, a weekly pensioner of some religious society. By Miss Sally, the little Protestant clear-starcher was looked upon as a spy, and dreaded and avoided accordingly.

One day a handsome carriage stopped at the door, and a lady of modish appearance having inquired for Miss Sally, alighted, and ascended the stairs to her room. She had some very fine work with her, and concerning this she had a hundred instructions to give. Miss Sally remembered afterwards that while she was talking about the work the lady's eyes kept glancing here and there rather curiously. But as this was by no means unusual in her fine lady visitors, it caused her no uneasiness at the time. Her customer at last departed, and Miss Sally resumed her occupation, suspended during the rather tedious directions to which she had to hearken.

The visitor's sharp eyes, however, had not gone a-prying in vain. Inside the front room there was, as I have often seen in those old houses, a little room or closet, without any window, only lighted by means of a glass door connecting it with the apartments without. It came out subsequently that the fine lady spy had seen the shadow of a man inside. In less than half an hour the whole street was filled with soldiers, and up to Miss Sally's room they came to secure their prisoner.—They knew he had not had time to escape; they also knew that from the closet there was no second outlet; so, when they were in the room without, they were sure he was trapped.

Into the closet, then, they thronged, General Duff at their head. But the room was apparently empty. It was without furniture, save a mattrass, a chair and a table, on which were the remains of a meal. In one corner was a little heap of firewood, but not large enough to conceal a man. For a moment the soldiers were taken aback—next moment they were reassured.

There was bricked-up fireplace in the room; and round it they all gathered. At that time there was a tax called hearth money, and people used to build a sort of wall of bricks around a fireplace, that the inspector might see when he came that they made no use of it. Aye, and maybe, when he'd turn his back, the bricks would be taken down until the time for the next visit. However, as luck would have it, Miss Sally had really no use for this fireplace; I suppose it was as much as she could do, poor lady, to keep up the fire in the front room.

And it so happened that the bricks were well and firmly built, and even plastered over, and they reached to within a couple of feet of the ceiling. There was just room for a man inside, and down there, as the soldiers guessed, the goor fugitive had dropped.—He had only a few minutes notice of their coming, and, catching up a hatchet tha was in the corner with the firewood, he had just had time to clamber up and gain his temporary place of refuge when they broke in.

With a throbbing heart he listened to their threats, their cries of anger, their oaths. He heard them asking if it would not be best to shoot down upon him, and kill him in his lair. But Gen. Duff bawled out, "No, no?—not for a hundred thousand pounds! He must be taken alive! He cannot escape us; pull down the brick work, and he is ours!" They then set to, and worked hotly; and what with the knocking and hammering, and crushing and shouting, there was such an uproar as was never heard before in poor Miss Sally Carmody's lodgings. The bricks being solidly built and plastered, it was not as easy as they had anticipated to tear them away. And when at last they did effect their purpose, their purposed prisoner had again baulked them—how was plainly to be seen.

While they were uprooting the bricks that screened him from them, he savage, or other feeling that there was no heartstone under his feet, had conceived the hope that by cutting away the floor he might drop down into the room below, and so have another chance of getting off. With the hatchet he had caught up, he fell to work, the noise he made completely drowned by the uproar without and, some minutes before their object was effected, he landed in the room below.

Instantly the alarm was given by the soldiers nearest the hearth place. Some of their number remained above, while the rest hurried down to get into the room below. But here was another delay, for the woman who occupied it—a good Protestant, as several of them knew, and therefore not to be suspected of voluntarily harboring a French spy (for such they declared the fugitive to be)—was absent, and the door was locked. Some who had hurried round to the back of the house found the window of the room fast bolted on the inside, and there was no other outlet from it.

With a shout they announced their certainty that the Frenchman was still in the house, caught in his own trap.—So they called for a crowbar to break open the door and seize him at last.—Somehow, none of them ventured to follow him through the hole he had made in the floor and ceiling. They knew he must be armed—they had abundant proof of his energy and desperation; and the bravest man that ever stepped might well be pardoned for not adopting a means of descent sure to be fatal to himself.

But, just as the crowbar was about to be put into requisition, there was a cry of "Stop! stop!" from a female voice in the crowd, and presently a little woman, greatly flurried and excited, came elbowing her way towards them. "Oh, general, honey," she cried, "sure ye wont break open my little room? I have the key somewhere—only wait one minit!" And the little clear-starcher fumbled desperately in her pockets and in the bosom of her dress, vowing the while, as well as she could speak, that it was "the Lord sent her back from her errand in time to prevent her little place from being smashed!" Still the poor creature was so frightened and so confused that it was not until the general, losing all patience, had again called for the crowbar, that the key at length made its appearance in answer to a despairing dive into the depths of a capacious side-pocket.

It was snatched from her, the door was flung open, and the men poured in. In a moment every crook and cranny was ransacked in vain. There was no trace of the fugitive, and they were completely at fault. The window shut, and bolted on the inside, precluded any idea of escape in that direction; the fire cheerfully burning in the large grate as unusually proved that he could not have ascended the chimney; he was nowhere in the room, yet was plain to all beholders the aperture in the ceiling by which he had got down. And louder than the cries of the angry soldiers were those of the little clear-starcher, whose apartment had been so unceremoniously disfigured. The would-be captors were baffled by the devil himself!

But the evil one had had no need, even were he so inclined, to interfere in the matter. The little Protestant clear-starcher had contrived very cleverly to outwit the soldiery. That she was odd in her ways was certain; for, while every man, woman or child, except herself, was in commotion on the arrival of the military, she remained at her wash-tub, rubbing away and listening to the uproar and blows overhead, as if nothing at all unusual were the matter. There she was, when the ceiling gave way, and the poor hunted Frenchman, pale and covered with dust, stood before her. She never cried out or even spoke; she just looked at him a second, then pointed to the window; he sprang out, and hastened off in the direction she indicated. The little woman dusted the windowsill where he had left the prints of his feet, shut the window, bolted it on the inside, threw some fresh fuel on the fire, and mingled unobserved with the people in the street.

Wherever the Frenchman was, he was saved. When he jumped out through the window he made off across a garden, on through other gardens, out into a field where some men were digging potatoes. These seeing him running, and his dress all torn, guessed how it was, and one of them gave him his jacket, another his brogues, another his carbeen, and they rubbed clay over his hands and face, and otherwise aided his disguise.

They put a spade into his hand, and set him to dig with them. By-and-by the soldiers came to make inquiries, and were sent off on a wild goose chase after a gentleman without a hat, whom they said they had seen running in an opposite direction. The soldiers never found him, and the fugitive got safe back to France. It was not rightly known what he was; some said one thing and some another; but from what General Duff cried out when the soldiers waited to fire down on him, it was believed it must be somebody of great consequence. The poor people said it was the King of France.

CRISPER COMA.
Oh! she was beautiful and fair,
With starry eyes, and radiant hair,
Whose curling tendrils soft, entwined,
Enchained the very heart and mind.
CRISPER COMA.
For Curling the Hair of either Sex into Wavy and Glossy Ringlets or Heavy Massive Curls.
By using this article, Ladies and Gentlemen can beautify themselves a thousand fold. It is the only article in the world that will curl straight hair, and at the same time give it a beautiful, glossy appearance. The Crisper Coma not only curls the hair, but invigorates, beautifies, and cleanses it; is highly and delightfully perfumed, and is the most complete article of the kind ever offered to the American public. The Crisper Coma will be sent to any address, sealed and postpaid for $1.
