we say, it is humbug. We don't say that he meant this, although some have so understood it.

But, furthermore, if the editor intended to convey the idea to the public mind, that we, as one organized body of prohibitionists, were so "crazed" with "one idea" in reference to the mode of suppressing the evils of intemperance as to render our efforts abortive and ourselves unworthy of public trust; if he intended this, then we will fight him with his own weapons.

Let it be remembered, once for all, that the editor declares himself a friend to temperance, and therefore is ready to adopt some mode to abolish intemperance. Now, there are but two modes known in the world, by which intemperance can be banished from the land, viz:—Moral suasion and prohibition or legal enactment. He thinks moral suasion to be the most effective instrumentality. So, in his article he espouses this mode and shows how much it has done and might do. The prohibitionists think the legal mode to be the most efficient in this work.—Now, there being but two modes suggested to the world for the abolition of intemperance—those who adopt one in preference to the other, are obliged to be men of one idea. And what is funny about the editor's position is, that he, himself, having discarded one mode and advocated the other, has become a man of "one idea." Does not the fact, that the editor adopts moral suasion as the proper mode and discards the legal, fix as deeply the stigma of one idealism upon him, as the fact that prohibitory men abandon the mode of moral suasion and espouse the legal, fixes upon them? Most certainly.

Ah, that reproachful arrow of "one idea" shot out from the Banner, has found a mark little meant by the archer. If it pierces prohibitionists, it enters as deeply into his vitals. Blind Sampson pulls down the house to kill his enemies, but kills himself too. It seems to us, that the Banner is in a fix.

There are but two modes of administering the Government recognized among us. These are the Whig and Democratic. The editor espouses the Democratic, therefore, he is a man belonging to "an organized party with one idea" of Government. This being so, his mind being bent "only in one direction," grows torpid in every other, just as a muscle will acquire unnatural size and strength by constant exercise, while the other muscles, not being called into action, will dwindle and grow weak. Thus "men become crazed, and injure the very cause they advocate, and which they honestly desire to promote." The Democrats are an organized party with "one idea" of administering the Government. The editor says, "We are opposed to trusting any set of men, who have but one idea" therefore, the editor is opposed to trusting his own party. Such is the legitimate result of his own reasoning.

This is the editor's own argument and words. We have only turned it against himself. Now, the true position is simply this: in accomplishing any great work, some one plan is more effective than others, and wise men always adopt one single mode which promises surest success. More anon. BETA.

HARD TO PLEASE.—Mr. Bragg at this place, complained that he was sick and tired of hearing the same identical speech from Mr. Dockery that he heard him make when he first met him in the East. We have no doubt if began to sound monotonous to the refined ear of Mr. Bragg, who had, according the reports of his speeches furnished by papers of both parties, changed his speech very materially in different localities. These locofoco leaders are strange men to get along with. Two years ago, they sent certificates over the State, to prove that Mr. Kerr had changed his speech. This year, their champion complains that Gen. Dockery wont change his speech, so that it may not grate so harshly on his refined and delicate ear.—Greensboro' Pat.

But we sorrow not without hope, for she fell asleep in Jesus, and left a clear and pious evidence, not only of her willingness, but of her full preparation to depart and be with Christ. In all the relations of life, she was faithful, loving and kind. She was respected and beloved while she lived, and now she is dead; her sweet and gentle virtues have left a rich perfume on many hearts. She was a member of the Methodist Church, for several years previous to her death, and sustained a character pious and unblamable.
