The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness, bowels in general costive, sometimes alternating with laxity. The head is troubled with pain and dull, heavy sensation, considerable loss of memory, accompanied with painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. Often complainings of weakness, debility and low spirits. Anecdote of Charles Dickens.

Fields is giving in the Galaxy, a series of anecdotes, reminiscences, and unpublished letters of the great "Boz," from which we select the following:

Let me commend to the attention of my numerous and nameless correspondents, who have attempted to soil the moral character of Dickens, the following little incident, related to me by himself during a summer evening walk among the Kentish meadows, a few months before he died. I will try to tell the story, if possible, as simply and naturally as he told it to me:

"I chanced to be traveling, some years ago," he said, "in a railroad carriage between Liverpool and London. Beside myself, there were two ladies, and a gentleman occupying the carriage. We happened to be all strangers to each other, but I noticed at once that a clergyman was of the party. I was occupied with a ponderous article in the Times, when the sound of my own name drew my attention to the fact that a conversation was going forward among the three other persons in the carriage with reference to me and my books. One of the ladies was perusing 'Bleak House,' then lately published, and the clergyman had commenced a conversation with the ladies by asking what book they were reading. On being told the author's name, and the title of the book, he expressed himself greatly grieved that any lady in England should be willing to take up the writings of so vile a character as Charles Dickens. Both the ladies showed great surprise at the low estimate the clergyman put upon an author whom they had been accustomed to read, to say the least, with a certain degree of pleasure. They were evidently much shocked at what the man said of the immoral tendency of these books, which they seemed never before to have suspected; but when he attacked the author's private character, and told monstrous stories of his immoralities in every direction, the volume was shut up and confined to the dark pockets of a traveling bag. I listened in wonder and astonishment, behind my newspaper, to stories of myself, which, if they had been true, would have consigned any man to a prison for life. After my fictitious biographer had occupied himself for nearly an hour with the eloquent recital of my delinquencies and crimes, I very quietly joined in the conversation. Of course I began by modestly doubting some statements which I had just heard touching the author of 'Bleak House' and other unimportant works of similar character. The man stared at me, and evidently considered my appearance on the conversational stage an intrusion and an impertinence.

"'You seem to speak,' I said, 'from personal knowledge of Mr. Dickens. Are you acquainted with him?'

"He rather evaded the question, but following him up closely, I compelled him to say that he had been talking, not from his own knowledge of the author in question, but he said he knew for a certainty that every statement he had made was a true one. I then became more earnest in my inquiries for proofs, which he arrogantly declined giving. The ladies sat by in silence, listening intently to what was going forward. An author they had been accustomed to read for amusement had been traduced for the first time in their hearing, and they were waiting to learn what I had to say in relation of the clergyman's charges. I was taking up his vile stories, one by one, and stamping them as false in every particular, when the man grew furious, and asked me if I knew Dickens personally. I replied, 'Perfectly well; no man knows him better than I do; and all your stories about him from beginning to end, to these ladies, are unmitigated lies.' The man became livid with rage, and asked for my card. 'You shall have it,' I said, and coolly taking out one, I presented it to him without bowing. We were just then nearing the station in London, so that I was spared a longer interview with my truthful companion; but if I were to live an hundred years, I should not forget the abject condition into which the narrator of my crimes was instantly changed. His face flushed white as his cravat, and his lips refused to utter words. He crouched like a wilted vegetable, and as if his legs belonged to somebody else. The ladies bended aware of the situation at once, and bidding them 'good day,' I followed immediately out of the carriage. Before I could get away from the station the man had mustered up strength sufficient to follow me, and his apologies were so nauseous and craven, that I pitied him from my soul. I left him with this caution: 'Before you make charges against the character of any man again, about whom you know nothing, and of whose works you are utterly ignorant, study to be a seeker after truth, and avoid lying as you would eternal perdition.'"

I never ceased to wonder at Dickens' indomitable cheerfulness, even when he was suffering from ill health, and could not sleep more than two or three hours out of the twenty-four. He made it a point never to inflict on another what he might be painfully enduring himself, and I have seen him, with what must have been a great effort, arrange a merry meeting for some friends, when I knew that almost any one else under similar circumstances would have sought relief in bed.

Suicide of a Cantatrice—Somewhat of a Mystery.

Few of our theatr-going people but will remember the beautiful Amelia Garcia, who, for three or four successive seasons, won unbounded applause on the stage of our principal theatre. Young, lovely and accomplished, the wonderful charm of her voice was augmented by great personal attractions. Gay, fascinating, and brilliant, she won admirers by the score, and at one time—in the height of her theatrical fame—was the most sought after and the acknowledged beauty of her profession.

That such a woman should have suddenly died without her death being made known is surprising. Nor will the public surprise be lessened when the fact is made known that she died a suicide.

Her death occurred about two weeks since, on Jackson street, near the corner of Annunciation, where she had resided for over a year past.

It will be remembered that about two years since she quit the stage and retired to private life. She had become passionately enamored of a gentleman in this city, and for his sake abandoned whatever of fame and prospect of advancement she had in her profession. She occasionally appeared on the street, always radiant, always beautiful, and whenever she came into the theatres or public places of amusement she was the cynosure of all eyes.—She enjoyed this public manifestation of admiration, and sustained it regally. Had she never been a famous singer, Garcia would still have been admired for her splendid beauty.

But it began to be whispered about that her life was not happy. Society had its observances that could not be neglected, and the poor singer, with all her beauty, could not retain an allegiance which society demanded to be broken.

The conviction came upon her slowly, but it came at last. To one of her passionate nature there was nothing left for her but to die. It would be wrong, if it were possible, to lift the veil from those last hours of her life. Convinced that the happiness she had bartered so much to secure was slipping from her grasp, and the cheerless future spreading dark before her, she resorted to that Lethean cup, the poison of the suicide, in which to drown the senses of her misery and the joyless life of a deserted and abandoned woman.

It is said that the morning (some two weeks since) the final separation took place—when her friend said good-bye for the last time—Garcia ordered her servant to go to the drug store and fetch her some laudanum. The servant, suspecting her design, refused to go. The command, repeated still more imperatively, was disregarded, and the servant with tears and entreaties besought her to refrain from her wicked intentions.

It had no effect, however, and she went herself to the poison. On what pretext she obtained it is not known; but the did get it, and having taken it, died from its effects.

The residents in the neighborhood say that about the time the poison must have commenced its fatal work she went and seated herself at the piano, and for more than an hour played and sang. Her rich, thrilling voice, rising to its full compass, revealed the sweetest music they had ever heard. Strains of passionate sorrow mingled with the sorrowful cadence of a funeral dirge as the dying cantatrice sung her life away.

Amelia Garcia was about 23 years of age, and a native of the West Indies. Her father was a Spanish Creole, and her mother a Jewess, a native of Germany. Her parents came to New York when she was quite young, and she commenced her professional career in that city. She sang one season at the Academy of Music in this city, and one or two engagements at other theatres. She left the stage, however, in 1869, and has not since appeared, professionally, in public.

Such, in brief, was the career of one of the sweetest singers and most beautiful women of the age. Whether her life was good or evil it behooves not to say. If she was reckless, frivolous and gay, she had, at least, a passionate and loving nature, and died a suicide.—N. O. Picayune.

Fiendish Murder.

We learn from a gentleman from Manassas that a most fiendish murder was perpetrated by a negro named Jake Weir, at that place, on Tuesday evening last. It seems that Weir and his victim, Ben. Johnson, had a slight difficulty some days ago, about some trivial matter, and on the day of the murder Johnson visited Manassas with a lot of vegetables for sale, and, after disposing of them, started home, but stopped near the village and seated himself on the railroad to count his money. While thus engaged Weir came up, and seizing a stake from a fence near by, struck Johnson on the head, felling him to the earth, and continued the blows until life was entirely extinct. The murderer was arrested, and a coroner's jury empanelled, before whom the above facts were elicited. The murderer was committed to the jail of Prince William county, to await trial.—Lynchburg News.

Horrible Accident.

The Alexandria Gazette says that two men employed in a quarry near the Chain bridge, on the Virginia side of the Potomac, met with a fatal accident on Thursday. They were engaged in drilling when a large mass of rock became loosened and fell, crushing them to death. Fifty tons of rock must have fallen upon their bodies. They had previously been cautioned by the foreman about their work. After much labor the remains were rescued, but were unrecognizable from having been crushed out of all semblance to humanity. The sight was sickening in the extreme, and the poor remnants of the unfortunate men were gathered up and removed to their homes, about five miles up the river. The names of the parties were Charles Elliott (white) and Frank Harris (colored).
