The Daily Review.

IN TIME TO COME.

The flowers are dead that made a summer splendor
By wayside nooks and on the sunny hill,
And with regret these hearts of ours grow tender,
As sometimes all hearts will.

We loved the blossoms, for they helped to brighten
The lives so dark with wearying toil and care,
As hopes and dreams forever help to lighten
The heavy loads we bear.

How like the flowers, whose transient life is ended,
The hopes and dreams are, that for one half hour,
Make the glad heart a garden bright and splendid
About love's latticed bower.

One little hour of almost perfect pleasure,
A foretaste of the happiness to come,
Then sudden frost—the garden yields its treasure,
And stands in sorrow, dumb.

Oh, listen, heart! The flower may lose its glory
Beneath the touch of frost, but does not die.
In Spring it will repeat the old, sweet story
Of God's dear by and by.

In heaven, it never here, the hopes we cherish—
The flowers of human lives we count as lost,
Will live again. Such beauty cannot perish;
And heaven has no frost.

—EBEN E. REXFORD

The Battle of New Orleans.

Gen. Harney has exploded one tradition that was long connected with this fight, which was that the Americans fought from behind breastworks of cotton bales. "I asked Gen. Jackson, Gen. Adair and Gen. Coffee, the latter having the immediate command of a brigade of the Tennessee and Kentucky sharpshooters, whose long rifles mainly did the work of death, if there were any cotton bales used at all, and they all answered that the only works the Americans had were of earth, about two and one-half feet high, rudely constructed of fence rails and logs laid twenty-four inches apart and the space between them filled with earth, and if there had been any works constructed from cotton bales they must have known it. In 1825 I was promoted to Captain in the First Infantry and sent to Nashville, Tenn., to recruit for my regiment. While there I met Gens. Jackson and Coffee very often and obtained from the former many details of the battle of Chalmette that are not in print."

"'There was a very heavy fog on the river on the morning of the fight,'" said Gen. Jackson, 'and the British troops were actually formed and moving before I had my arrangements made. But the instant I saw their formation, I said to Coffee, 'By G—, they are ours!' Coffee's part of our line was on the flank, which extended into the swamp. About a quarter of mile from it there was a huge plantation drainage canal, such as are common in the Louisiana lowlands. Here Gen. Packenham formed his first attacking column. His formation was a column in mass of about fifty files front. This was formed under the fire of the few regular artillerists I had in a little redoubt in Coffee's front, and that of some cannon taken from a man of war, placed in a battery on the river and served by sailors. Coffee, seeing the direction of the attack, which was intended to turn his flank, dashed forward and said to his men: 'Hold your fire until you can see their belt-buckles.' The riflemen were formed in two ranks behind the works mentioned, and when the first rank fired the second was loaded and ready. There were about eighteen hundred men behind this frail cover, all of whom were dead shots, and each had 100 bullets in his pouch and the necessary powder in his horn. The British troops came up to within 100 yards of our works without firing a musket. It was a beautiful sight to see. They marched as steadily shoulder to shoulder as though they were on review. At 100 yards distance the order was given them to charge. With a cheer and at double quick they came forward. They were about sixty yards distant when a long blazing flash ran all along our line. It was as pretty volley firing as I ever heard or saw.'"

"'The smoke hung so heavy that for the moment I could not make out just what had happened,' said Gen Jackson. 'In another instant there was another ringing volley that proved that it came from the riflemen. I called Tom Overton and Duncan, of my staff, and we galloped over to Coffee's line. Just then the smoke rose, and I saw that the head of the British column had literally melted away. In front of our lines lay one writhing, ghastly mass of dead and dying red-coats. The column recoiled and fell back to the canal, where they had started from, and were there reformed. This time the charge was led by Gen. Packenham in person, gallantly mounted and riding as coolly and gracefully as if he were on parade. Just as he came within range of my riflemen I saw him reel and topple out of his saddle mortally wounded. I have always believed he fell by the bullet of a free man of color in the fight who was a celebrated rifle shot from the Attakapas country of Louisiana."—Washington Sunday Herald.

How Scott Hanged Deserters.

At the battle of Cherubusco in the valley of Mexico, one of those series of battles which took place before the capital was captured, occurred one of most impressive acts of the entire war. I mean as to its effect upon the men of the army. It was one of those events which carried instant conviction to the minds of the soldiers that discipline and the allegiance to the flag were of paramount importance. After a desperate struggle the works were carried, and among the captured were found a number of deserters, men who joined the Mexicans and served the guns against their own comrades, and the full force of their aid is apparent when it is known that they were nearly all trained artillerists. On the discovery being made intense indignation prevailed, and nothing but the strictest discipline and prompt obedience to orders prevented the men from dealing out instant vengeance upon the deserters.

But a drum-head court-martial decided with due formality their fate, which was to be hanged, ignominiously, in the presence of all the army then at that point assembled. It must be understood that a portion of the forces were then engaged with the enemy at Chepultepec, that almost inaccessible fortress and very stronghold of the enemy, holding farther advances upon the city, and that the most desperate engagement was then undecided. The men were drawn up in due order, each with a rope around his neck—thirty deluded victims about to receive merited punishment for basely deserting the flag and turning the enemy's guns against their own comrades. The officer in charge, upon whom devolved the duty, cast a quick glance in the direction of Chepultepec. Suddenly a thought seemed to impress him and he said: 'Let them stand till they shall see the American flag upon the heights of Chepultepec." With breathless anxiety they waited. It was a hard fought battle, the final result being doubtful. Many brave men went down to rise no more, and many a man carried the wounds there received through life to his grave

The gallant Colonel Ransom, of the New England regiment, yielded his life; Captain Mayne Reid, whom I knew, and others, were wounded, and were among the first to enter the works.

Suddenly a shout went up that carried relief to some, at least, of those anxious watchers and dismay to the hearts of those men who stood awaiting their doom. The heights had been carried and the starry banner floated to the breeze. All eyes then turned to the sad spectacle before them. The deserters stood motionless as statues awaiting the doom they could not shun. They had taken their last look of the flag they had sworn to protect, and were sent "unannointed and unannealed" to answer to the 'last great roll call."—Boston Post.

With the new volume, beginning in December, HARPER'S MAGAZINE will conclude its thirty-fifth year. The oldest periodical of its type, it is yet, in each new volume, a new magazine, not simply because it presents fresh subjects and new pictures, but also, and chiefly, because it steadily advances in the method itself of magazine-making. In a word, the Magazine becomes more the faithful mirror of current life and movement. Leading features in the attractive programme for 1885 are: new serial novels by Constance Fenimore Woolson and W D Howells; a new novel entitled "At the Red Glove;" descriptive illustrated papers by F D Millett, R Swain Gifford, E A Abbey, H Gibson, and others; Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer," illustrated by Abbey; important papers on Art, Science, etc.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS AND MANUFACTURERS SHOULD READ

BRADSTREET'S

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF TRADE, FINANCE AND PUBLIC ECONOMY.

Sixteen Pages every Saturday. Oftentimes Twenty Pages. Sometimes Twenty-four Pages.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.

The foremost purpose of BRADSTREET is to be of practical service to business men. Its special trade and industrial reports; its weekly epitome of bankruptcies throughout the United States and Canada, and the summaries of assets and liabilities, are alone worth the subscription price; its synopses of recent legal decisions are exceedingly valuable. As commercial transactions, in the wider sense, are coming to be more and more conducted on a statistical basis, the information contained in BRADSTREET'S is of the first importance both to producers and middlemen.

The Trade and Agricultural Situation throughout the United States and Canada is reported by Telegraph to BRADSTREET'S up to the hour of publication

SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS.
