WM. E. PELL, PROPRIETOR.

The Great Convention—The Nominations.

The New York correspondent of the National Intelligencer furnishes the following graphic sketch of the proceedings immediately attending the nomination by the great National Democratic Convention:

"Soon after the opening of the session Mr. Brodhead, of Missouri, placed in nomination for the Presidency General Frank P. Blair, Jr., of Missouri. Then a delegate from California nominated Justice Stephen Field, of California.

At this moment Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, came forward and stated that he had been authorized and requested to lay before the Convention a telegraphic dispatch from George H. Pendleton to his friend Washington McLean, who is in this Convention.

The dispatch was read. It is eloquent and feling acknowledgment of the compliment paid to Mr. Pendleton already by the action of the Convention, but advises Mr. McLean to have his [Pendleton's] name withdrawn whenever it should be considered by his friends that any other candidate can command even one more electoral vote, and pledging himself to his utmost exertions in behalf of the nominee of this Convention, whoever he may be. It was a noble, patriotic, and frank admission of his position, and was received with enthusiastic cheering. The name of Mr. Pendleton was withdrawn, and the Convention proceeded to the nineteenth ballot. The States voted pretty much as they had done upon the previous ballot, until when Ohio was called. All eyes and ears were strained to hear the response. The vote was given to Asa Packer, of Pennsylvania. There was a murmur of deep disappointment throughout the hall. This was simply trifling.—Packer had been tried by his own State and abandoned. It was too plainly evident that Ohio was playing a game. Immediately all interest was concentrated upon Pennsylvania, and when her vote was again given clear and full for Hancock, the whole building shook with the cheers of the assembled multitude. There were few changes of importance on this ballot, and the Convention proceeded to the twentieth ballot. The period was exciting. There were some few inconsiderable changes by which Hancock's vote was diminished slightly, and Hendricks' vote increased, until these two candidates were very near together. Ohio, however, this time gave eleven votes for Hancock, and ten for English, of Connecticut. This kept Hancock still considerably ahead. Massachusetts retired to consult, but on her return gave eleven of her twelve votes to Hancock. The excitement was rapidly attaining fever heat. But the twenty first ballot was called. There were few changes. Hancock held his own, and [illegible] his previous votes for Salmon P. Chase. This produced vociferous and prolonged cheering in the galleries, which almost overflowed with delight whenever any Western candidate was brought into the list.

Then came the twenty-second and the last ballot. A feeling pervaded the whole assembly that something would break now. New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania were closely watched. Hendricks was gaining a little, here and there, in such fashion that it seemed probable he would go ahead of Hancock. When Ohio was called to vote, her chairman, General George W. McCook, rose, and in an eloquent speech placed in nomination again the name of Horatio Seymour, of New York.

This nomination was received with tremendous applause, lasting for several minutes. At last, upon the restoration of order, Governor Seymour, with much emotion, alluded to the action of Ohio with deep regret; and, thus expressing his appreciation of the compliment intended to be conferred, and his devotion to the principles of the party, he reiterated what he had heretofore stated—that not only duty, but honor, forbade him to become a candidate at this time, and that he could not accept such a nomination.

Ohio, however, through Mr. Vallandigham, insisted that the vote should stand as recorded, and urged that when the office seeks the man, and not the man the office, in all times of great public peril and necessity, it is the duty of the citizen to forego personal and private considerations, and be willing to serve the public good.

Mr. Vallandigham was followed by Mr. Kernan, of New York, who, as a neighbor of Governor Seymour, stated how he was beloved and respected by the New York delegation, and how he had been entreated to accept the nomination, and how, also, he had persistently refused it, upon such grounds as precluded an attempt on the part of the New York delegation to force it upon him at this point of the proceedings.

Governor Seymour retired to the platform, evidently much concerned, and not a little incensed by the time things were taking. General Price took the floor. It was already plain from the demonstration in the hall that the nomination was made. The secretary undertook to proceed with the roll-call. There was a wish among the delegations to be the first to ratify the nomination, and Indiana was the first to second this, came Pennsylvania. By this time the hall was the scene of direst confusion, the whole Convention and the galleries cheering vociferously. The chairmen of delegations were impotently bawling at the top of their voices, asking to record the votes of their States for Seymour, and the secretary making vain efforts to be heard.

The Chairman, Gen. Price, took things coolly. He was eminently fit for the emergency. When the enthusiasts in the galleries had bawled themselves hoarse, and throw on the floor had flung all the rims off their hats, Gen. Price quietly called a halt to this demonstration, and the secretary proceeded, amidst comparative quiet, to call the roll of States, when every vote was given to Horatio Seymour, of New York, and he was declared unanimously chosen as the candidate of the Democratic National Convention for President of the United States. It is a fact that this nomination was made by the great Western States. They have all the time had the nomination in their power, and they have made the candidate. Mr. Seymour was earnest and sincere in declining the nomination, on account of solemn pledges he had made to his family not to accept it, and even the New Yorkers were, for the most part, taken by surprise. The nomination is, however, regarded as a most excellent one.

Among our living statesmen, Horatio Seymour stands in the front rank as a Democrat. None can question the purity and solidity of his devotion to Democratic principles. As a patriot he is renowned for his earnest efforts while Governor of New York to expedite the readiness of the New York troops for the field. In private and public character he is without reproach, and his official course is marked with strictness, integrity, efficiency and attention. Although some would have preferred here and there another candidate, all agree that with Horatio Seymour at our standard bearer we shall triumphantly win the race.

After the nomination of the President, a recess was taken for an hour for refreshments. The newspaper men improved it in getting up the mass of work before them, and the delegates in consultation as to the Vice President.

Upon the termination of the recess, nominations for the Vice Presidency were in order.

Upon a call of the States, Illinois presented the name of John A. McClernand, a compeer of Clay and Webster; a distinguished General of the late war, whose brain conceived the capture of Vicksburg, though the credit of that achievement was given to a much inferior man. This was received with vociferous cheering.

Gen. McClernand rose to thank the Convention, but asked the delegation from Illinois to withdraw his name. [Cries of "No, no."] He had no ambition, except in relieving the country from the thraldom which now binds her. He said the soldiers would heartily accept the nomination of Seymour. The soldiers and sailors were not all for a sham hero—a creature of fortuitous circumstances. More than half of them would vote for the patriot, orator, and statesman, Horatio Seymour.

In conclusion, he said he was in earnest, and asked the withdrawal of his name.

The name of General McClernand, then, at his own request, was withdrawn.

Iowa presented the name of Augustus E. Dodge.

Kansas nominated General Thomas Ewing, Jr., the favorite of the recent Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention. This nomination was seconded by Maine.

General Preston, of Kentucky, nominated Major General Francis P. Blair, Jr., of Missouri. This nomination was at once seconded by General Steedman, on behalf of Louisiana. As in the case of the nomination of Seymour, every State vied with the others in being among the earliest to ratify this nomination. One after another, as rapidly as they could be heard, amongst the wildest confusion, their votes were received and recorded for Francis P. Blair, Jr., as Vice President, until the whole three hundred and seventeen electoral votes had been recorded in favor of General Blair. The result was greeted with tremendous cheering.

Ever since the nomination of Seymour cannon had been fired in the adjacent Union Square, and bands had been playing in front of the building. The work of the Convention was done.

The crowd began to move—that crowd that had for hours shouted itself hoarse with huzzas, and tired its arms with waving red bandanas; that crowd that had for hours been pent up in its vast masses, seeking to save the nation and the country from fearful impending perils.

A committee of one from each State was appointed to wait upon the candidates and notify them of their nomination.
