Family Grave for Sale.

Charles Surface's attempt to sell his ancestors' portraits has been improved on by an advertiser in a religious journal, who announces: "Lady, leaving England permanently, must sell family grave; hold five." This is probably the first time that a second-hand tomb and its contents have been publicly offered as a bargain.

A Lead Pipe Clinch.

"The expression 'a lead pipe cinch' originated in Brooklyn, N. Y.," explained a well-known turfman. "Though it is very frequently used by sporting people it is not over twenty-five years old, and I doubt if it is that old. It indicates a sure thing, or at least that is thought to be dead sure. There are several explanations of its origin, but I am satisfied that Brooklyn was its home. It was coined in this way: Some years ago a fellow employed in a plumbing shop and stole a piece of lead pipe. He wanted to take it over to New York, and to keep it from being seen he wrapped the pipe around his body, and then put his clothes on over it. A cinch, in turf language, means a girth or saddle band or anything that is used to keep a saddle on a horse or make tight. 'Cinching up' means therefore, tightening up, and is of Spanish origin. As the fellow with the lead pipe around his body jumped to catch the ferryboat he fell overboard, and, of course, the weight of the lead carried him down. A bystander, in explaining the occurrence, said the thief had 'a lead pipe cinch' on the lead, and it drowned him."—Washington Star.
