In the House of Representatives, on Thursday last, the morning hour having expired, Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, rose to a question of privilege.

MR. FOOTE DEFENDS HIMSELF.

Mr. Foote rose to a question of privilege — He had been prevented from attending the sessions of the House by the interference of other persons. His rights had been invaded and his reputation assailed, and he wished to be heard in their vindication.

Thirty-five members of this House had voted, in his absence, that the arrest and detention which he had suffered, were no breach of his privilege as a member of the House — Some of these were his long-standing personal enemies; others were gentleman for whom he had a high respect, but they must have acted without consideration.

Mr. F. proceeded to state the privileges of legislators, as understood in England. The seizure and detention of a member of Parliament while Parliament is in session, would be punished by the block.

The House had been informed of his arrest He would state the circumstances. He had obtained a passport for his wife and child to go through our lines, on her way to Nashville, where she was born, where she had lived, and where she had hung out the first Confederate flag. Since she had joined him, two years ago, she had not seen or heard directly from two infant children whom she left in Nashville. She had not heard at all for twelve months. Her distress was extreme, her anxiety to see them threatened even her reason. He had been seeking for her the privilege of a return to Nashville. He thought it his duty to escort his wife to the Potomac. He had attended her to King George. Finding it impracticable to put her over the Potomac there, he sought for her an ingress in the direction of Alexandria. Within two miles of Occoquan river, he was accosted by two scouts, who asked for his pass. He told them that he was a member of Congress, that he had a right to be there; that he intended to cross the Occoquan, and get into communication with peace men in Washington, and to proceed to that city, if safe to do so, with a view to see whether or not a pacification could not be effected consistent with our noble claim to independence. The scouts, and the officer to whom they conducted him, thought he ought to be discharged; but their orders restrained them. He had been brought here under custody and this morning had been discharged by the Court.

Mr. Foote then read a letter of resignation which he had addressed to the Speaker under date of ———, but which had been delayed in transmission, and had come again in his possession. It stated that he was about to cross the Potomac and proceed to Washington, in order to effect peace, if possible, between the two belligerents, that in taking this step no one had been consulted or responsible but himself; that he anticipated great fame if successful, great obloquy if he failed; that he proposed to visit Washington City neither as a revealer of Confederate secrets, nor as a spy upon the United States that he might be held by the United States courts as a criminal—he might die on the scaffold; but he would die cheerfully, because dying for his country.

Mr. Foote said he learned afterwards that the difficulties were greater than he had expected, that he could not reach Washington City without first taking the oath of allegiance to the United States at Alexandria—which he had no idea of doing. He then decided to resign absolutely his seat, so that no one could be compromised by his self-appointed mission, and he added a postscript to his letter accordingly. He had since concluded to withhold his resignation, in order to await some further and more promising developments. He would not resign, certainly, pending a resolution of censure. He would meet every one who wished to censure him.

Mr. F. proceeded to detail other reasons for his self-appointed mission to Washington.— He had become discouraged by the condition and the tendency of public affairs. He thought the time had come for negotiation.— He determined to throw himself into this work. He thought he occupied a favorable position as a mediator or negotiator. His connection with the compromise measures of 1850 was well known at the North. His uniform past advocacy of the Union, and his known desire for peace, he thought would secure him a hearing. In California he was intimately known. He had there four children and eight grandchildren. He thought he could be useful, and he was willing to make the effort and run the hazard.

Several points of order were raised whether or not a discussion of the right to arrest a member, under the circumstances of Mr. Foote's case, allowed so wide a range of debate.

The Speaker said that strictly it did not; that the question of privilege from arrest did not include the motives which might cause a member to place himself in a position that might be supposed to expose him to arrest; that the member would have a right to debate these motives in mitigation, if any action were pending against him; but not on the mere question of power to make an arrest.— If the House chose to hear the member generally, its own action would be unrestrained.

The House decided, by a vote of 48 to 18, to hear Mr. Foote at large.

Mr. Foote, then proceeded to dwell at much length on what he deemed the errors and, the false policy of the Executive and of Congress; the disasters that had resulted and the dangers which had been produced. He charged personally unfriendly sentiments on the President, whom he had beaten as Governor of Mississippi, and upon Secretary Seddon, whom he had arraigned before a committee —making thereupon some remarks which the Chair, on the point of Mr. Machen, ruled out of order. Mr. Foote proceeding still further in the same or a more violent strain, the Speaker required him to take his seat, and decided that, under the rules, he could only proceed by a vote of the House.

Mr Foote said he would content himself with publishing the rest of the remarks he had designed to submit. He concluded by asking a leave of absence for two months, stating that his purpose was to proceed to his constituents, or as near to them as he could get, (Mr. Foote represents the Nashville district) and would consult them on the great question of peace and war, and upon the rights due to himself as their representative.

Mr Foote subsequently withdrew the application, whereupon

The House adjourned.

For the Confederate.

TO LULA.

O, tell me, Lula, why so sad?
And why that pensive brow?
Is it for some departed lad,
Who shall be nameless now?

Thy face was wont with smiles to beam,
As brightly as the sun,
Thy heart, so full of pleasure's dream,
With gladness overrun.

But now mesceres a low'ring cloud
Has overspread that face,
Some grief thy gleesome spirit bow'd,
And sadness filled its place.

I could not wish to give the pain,
Or cause thee heave one sigh;
Yet that I long this pow'r to gain,
I seek not to deny;

For such, if by a Prince possess'd,
Would swell his soul with pride;
He'd feel his lot was truly bless'd,
Whatever fate betide.

"The Savannah Traitors."

Who are these men who have spoken for a city? Who are these men that have bidden a State to their unnatural and unhallowed feast? Who are these men that, thrusting themselves forward as the champions of a dishonorable peace, invite the careful scrutiny of their former fellow-citizens? Is there among them a soldier? Not one. Is there among them a man who has felt the hardships of this war, upon either person or property? Not one. They have been basking in the sunshine of prosperity and resting in inglorious ease, while their brethren and sons have been battling with an unequal and hated foe. That they were gentlemen of worth, intelligence, refinement and social standing, is but adding a deeper tinge to their shame. Dr. Arnold, the Mayor of the city, a physician of merit, a man of intellect, would never have presided over that meeting, nor uttered the sentiments attributed to him, had he been—younger. But time has laid his heavy hand upon him; has stilled the restless pulse of youth; has brought him to that point where "the keepers of the house tremble," and "the strong men bow themselves," and "fears are in the way." It will be some consolation to his former friends to know that he, at least, will feel no remorse. Nature can never react in him, and while we pity, we cannot blame.

Colonel W. S. Rockwell—well known throughout the State for his great pretensions to military science, strategetic skill and the art of war, before the war—but better known to the Army of Tennessee, (where he underwent a ten days' campaign of untold, because untried hardships) for his utter incapacity and lack of those soldierly qualities exhibited by him in "that little affair of '36," has rolled into that proud position he is said to have told the lamented Bartow his preferences led him. He preferred "to live in Savannah, where champagne and oysters could be found, rather than in history." If history remembers him at all, it will be to record his name among those who left his country, for his country's good.

Dr. T. T. Willis, who came from Augusta, and for aught we know farther North, will be feelingly remembered by the stockholders in the Augusta and Savannah Railroad, as the enterprising President, who, not fraudulently, but dexterously, purchased a large quantity of stock in said road at a low figure, before he published to the dumb founded and astonished stockholders, a scheme which he had some time before perfected, and which had the effect of doubling the value of the stock. He made for himself a very pretty, but a very dirty, penny by it. The wonder is, that the spirit of his noble son—slain in battle—did not rise from his newly made grave and rebuke him. Brave and gallant youth—worthy son of unworthy sire—hero of many a hard fought battlefield—a nation mourns and honors thee, though thy own father has grasped in friendship the bloody hands of thy murderers, and written "traitor" upon thy hallowed resting place.

A. S. Hartridge, who quickly doffed his martial habiliments after a brief sojourn as A. D. C. upon the staff of a brave officer, and slipped into the comfortable position of a war tax collector, is perhaps only known as the brother of Hon. Julian Hartridge, representative from the first Congressional district of Georgia. He has attempted to inflict a stain upon the reputation of an honored house, so nobly upheld by his brothers in the field, and in the halls of Congress. Et tu Brute.

Mr., formerly Major, Robert Erwin is one of the chivalry, and delighted in former days to descant upon the virtues of his native State of South Carolina. At the commencement of this strife, feeling his utter inability to hate the Yankee nation, he would fain have hired a world to help him. But things are changed, and he now "roars you as gently as a sucking dove." He, too, was tempted by the pomp and circumstance of glorious war to lead "a soger life," but finding the duties arduous—way dangerous—he quietly united the occupation of a quartermaster with that of a commission merchant and a speculator, and so deftly were they joined, that one could hardly tell where one began and t'other ended. But what of all that? He has saved his wealth and lost nothing but his honor.

Alderman Villalonga, a very weak disciple and wealthy; Alderman Lippman, speculator of the Jewish persuasion; L. G. Mills, who gave up the fight and cried, "hold enough!" ere it began; Martin Duggan and Alderman O'Byrne, famous only for the facility with which they changed one flag to another; W. D. Weed, a coarse, unmannered Yankee, who sent his sons and his money to Europe at the beginning of the war, and Alderman Lachlison, "a canny Scotchman," who has by this unguarded act caused the blush of shame to mantle the cheek of his "brave braw ladie," complete the roll of infamy.

As a citizen of Savannah, proud of her honor and of her fair fame—in the name of her good men crushed and bowed down by this ignominious act—in the name of her fair daughters, ever foremost in deeds of charity and words of encouragement, outraged by these creatures who arrogate to themselves the virtues of patriots—in the name of her brave soldiers, facing the enemy upon every battlefield—and finally, in the name of her heroic dead, who sleep in nameless graves upon the slopes of the Blue Ridge and in the Valley of the Shenandoah—from Pennsylvania to Texas—I protest against this covenant of treason and degradation.

HIDES! HIDES!!

The undersigned returns his acknowledgements for the extensive patronage he has heretofore received at the hands of the people; and earnestly solicits a continuance thereof. Owing to the high prices of oil and tallow, I am compelled to "change my base," and will in future tan all hides for one third; which will be sold at the market price. Tanning done for indigent soldiers free of charge as heretofore, and those able to pay, can get their hides tanned at 50 cents per pound.

All persons who have hides in my yard will be informed when their leather is ready.
