Health And Safety Tips

From The American Medical Association

EPILEPSY

Epilepsy is a brain disorder usually characterized by some type of seizure or convulsion.

There are many causes, all associated with damage to the brain. There is no "cure" but complete or almost complete control can be obtained in half of all patients and another 30 per cent can obtain partial control of the seizures with proper medical diagnosis and treatment. There are a number of anti-convulsant drugs now available that are safe and non-habit forming which may be prescribed by a physician.

Most people with epilepsy can lead normal lives; attend school, participate in sports and games, get and hold a job.

Should someone near you have an epileptic seizure, keep calm. The patient usually isn't suffering or in danger. Help him to a safe place but do not restrain his movements. Loosen tight clothing and turn him on his side.

Do not attempt to force a hard object between his teeth and do not give him anything to drink. Stand by until the patient has fully recovered consciousness and from the confusion which usually follows a seizure. Assure him all is well and encourage him to rest a bit before going about his regular activities.

An epileptic seizure is a frightening experience to those who are unfamiliar with the condition and its manifestations. But the patient usually recovers with little or no harm.

Epilepsy is a widespread condition. Some authorities estimate that 1 in 100 persons suffer from seizures of varying degree which would mean almost 2,000,000 individuals in the United States.

If someone in your family has epilepsy, be sure he sees a doctor according to schedule. The anti-convulsant drugs likely will enable the patient to lead a relatively normal life.
