Miss [illegible] Macfl[illegible] the as[illegible] an [illegible]

[illegible] Daggett is at [illegible] Park hotel [illegible] for several [illegible] for her journey [illegible] state for a [illegible] for her [illegible] mountain workers. [illegible] endeavoring to char[illegible] mountain people, to find [illegible] native industries, and to [illegible] point of view be[illegible] their surroundings, embodied [illegible] the spirit in which they [illegible] their new work. The wonderful and intricate embroideries and [illegible] which have been brought and taken to them personally by Mrs. Vanderbilt, and which have been copied with marvelous precision in the shortest possible time, has aroused the greatest interest and curiosity in this country. The primitive mountain people of America, unlike the Irish peasantry and that of other countries, who have inherited through many generation the gift of lace making, embroidering and other handicrafts, and that they who have lived like hermits knowing nor seeing nothing of the world and the beauties therein should so easily and readily execute the different patterns without fault, seems little less than a miracle. Mrs. Daggett wishes to obtain their impressions of the new knowledge and the effect it has upon them and their lives. Some exceedingly interesting incidents will be related in the articles. The extremely sensitive nature of the mountain people and the efforts of those connected with the work to hedge them around have impeded the writers work somewhat, but the barriers have been overcome to a more or less extent. It is probable that Mrs Vanderbilt on her arrival will not permit Mrs. Daggett to further investigate the subject, in so far as the workers on the estate are concerned with it. Mrs Daggett leaves today for Columbia, S. C., and will return shortly for a brief stay during which time she will make other visits to the mountaineers.
