FARMING WITH A WILL

[illegible]

[illegible] Most of the land was high, say 2 miles or more where the brook joined a kind of bog covering two or three acres.

The neighborhood seemed to be composed principally well-to-do farmers, that is to say, farmers that managed to live and keep out of debt by practicing the strictest economy and prudence. Thrift and enterprise had not succeeded thus to the extent of making that almost an earthly paradise was theirs if they would but work. The old regime it was too plain still held its way over them, though there might be some signs of its weakening in the new and improved farm machinery seen here and there.

After looking the place over I asked the price of it and was told it was seven hundred dollars. I told the owner that I would take my wife up and see the place and if she liked I would give him five hundred dollars. She was content with my account of it and the bargain was closed at six hundred and fifty dollars. Two hundred down and the balance in four years with interest annually.

My resolution to have the machine sleep and take to farming caused no little surprise to our friends, and many asked: "But what can you do with the land with the money so far expended to build one?"

Time I could not to build a stylish mansion, neither could our forefathers when they first came to the country. They were content to live in hovels and log cabins, and were happy to get them in peace. They had the primitive forests to cleet away but I had only a few [illegible] trees and stumps to get rid of and neighbors all about from whom I could procure all necessary help to supplement what it was necessary to obtain from the store towns of course. Instead of being obliged to build a shelter of trees or branches and bark, there was a saw mill about half a mile below my lot on the same brook, and there I could buy lumber, especially of a rather poor quality, very cheap.

My wife and I talked this all over and determined to begin in the cheapest and most primitive way that could be made comfortable. It was coming warm weather and we determined to try the experiment to begin with a kind of camp life. Accordingly, as soon as [illegible] was up at the machine shop I went up to Flat Hill and bought of relatives I had bought a second or table, third rate [illegible] and another with rifle wagon, whose chief quality was like the little horse, that it was strong. I bought tools of the very best I could find, and I was ready to start very early before it was light when I set off with my new team for the country.

The first thing I did was to look the place over and decide where it was best to pitch our camp.

After selecting upon the site for my camp I went down the trees and saw that grew upon it, then drove to the saw mill for lumber. I found the owner an intelligent and agreeable man, himself the owner of a farm which he cultivated on the shares, leaving the mill in charge of a man who was high [illegible] Black Hill. There was plenty of water in the brook the year round, though it was low in summer. The farmer, Mr. and Mrs. Solomon Trafton, a man and wife of fifty years of age, judging from appearances. Healthy and strong as could be from the city had [illegible] Flat Hill farm [illegible]

How the Treasury is Guarded.

A party of Englishmen who recently visited Washington expressed surprise at the absence of guards at the Treasury. "Why," they said, "at the Bank of England, the military is always on duty, and to get past it and into the building is worthone's life, unless he has authority. Here I don't see a guard." But there are guards and plenty of them, only they don't wear red coats and parade up and down the street in front of the building. That isn't the way we do things here. "Do you see this armory?" said Capt. Cobaugh, the chief of the force, to the correspondent, opening a door as he did so and disclosing nine rows of loaded rifles. These were of the largest and best variety known to the military authorities. "We have SIXTY men armed with these," he said, "and nearly all old soldiers. I should like to see any successful attempt to rob the Treasury. These men are divided into watches, and are on duty in all part of the building at all hours. After the force of clerks and officials goes home at night, one officer enters and inspects every room, see that the safes are all locked, the heating apparatus all right and the water turned off. It is safe to say I and my chief, a man is put on each floor, and the person whose duty it was to see it locked is sure to see. Of course it does not often happen, and the man who does forget once to lock his safe does not forget it twice; but occasionally we do find one open. Then after the rooms are inspected and the guard set, the lieutenant makes his rounds every two hours, and the watchman patrols his beat every fifteen minutes or oftener."

"Has there ever been an attempt, successful or otherwise, to rob the treasury?"

"Never, it would be an impossibility."

Col. Webster, Chief Clerk of the Treasury, is at the head of the watch, though Capt. Cobaugh has the personal directions of their movements. They are all inspected, and are liable to visits at any time of night from the Secretary or his Chief Clerk. Treasurer Spinner, it is related, once found himself in a very nervous state of mind at night and unable to sleep, having an indefinable feeling that something was wrong at the Treasury. He tossed about awhile unable to sleep, and finally dressed himself and started for the Treasury, to be met by a messenger coming to tell him that a safe containing millions of dollars had been found unlocked. It is said that he always slept in the building after that, and always visited the safes in person before retiring to see that they were locked. Perhaps it was his nervousness over the fright that made his signature so crooked.—Baltimore American.

Speed of Thought.

Many people have noticed the remarkable quickness of thought in dreaming, how a long story, with many details and extending over a great period of time, will flash through the mind in a few minutes, but they seldom have any means of even approximately measuring the quickness with which they sometimes stream. There is now going the rounds of the press a story purporting to tell the dream of a railway engineer, which, if true, affords a means of measurement, and the story itself has every appearance of being a genuine relation of experience. The engineer had been without sleep and on duty for many hours, and at last fell asleep on his post. Then he dreamed quite an elaborate story of an accident resulting from an confusion of train orders; how he studied over the words of the dispatch, trying to make out their meaning, and then how his train coming into collision with another, he was thrown into the air and dropped back into his seat in the cab with his hand on the throttle. At that instant consciousness returned, and he found that it was all a dream, and that although his train was traveling at the rate of 45 miles an hour, it had gone only 250 feet while the dream was passing through his mind, this distance being fixed by the position of the train with respect to signal lights on the line. This is the interesting part of the story, for if there measurements are approximately correct, the dream occupied less than four seconds of time.—Ledger.

Blue-Grass vs. Corn.

The method of handling cattle on the celebrated blue-grass farm of Jas. N. Brown's sons in Sangamon county, Ill., is something out of the common order of doing things in the West.

These gentlemen own about 1,000 acres of as fine land as there is in this or any other State. It lies in the heart of the great corn belt yet they do not plant an acre of corn to feed to their 1,000 head of cattle. Indeed they do not feed the article except in case of a protracted severe storm. They always purchase a small amount for such a contingency. Their cattle live, thrive, and grow fat on blue-grass alone. They pasture, are fed and sold over about two crops of grass and value the fertilizer they leave on the land as much as the cost of the feed. Their method is as follows: They have a number of large pasture fields, each containing about 100 acres, and each field is provided with a good water supply. When the grass is ready for the cattle they are turned into the field and left there until the grass is eaten down to the roots, when they are taken out and put into another field, the first one being left to recuperate. They are never housed nor stabled, but are left to shift for themselves in the open fields, winter and summer, and are never fed a mouthful of anything except the grass they get in the pasture. Healthy and strong as could be from the city had [illegible] Flat Hill farm [illegible]

Capturing a Tiger.

One day about Christmas, 1883, a Chinaman came into the city of Singapore, in India, in great haste, to report that a tiger had fallen into a pit which had been dug as a trap. A purchaser was soon found for the beast, and six Malays started out to bring him to the city.

The first thing done was to rig up a strong beam over the mouth of the pit. Next there was prepared a strong double basket of green rattan, one end of which was open, while the other was closed, except a little hole.

The planks covering the mouth of the pit were then slightly separated, a strong rope with a noose on one end was lowered, and slipped over the tiger's head in spite of his resistance. This done, the end of the rope was put through the basket entering at the open end and passing out through the small hole opposite. It was then carried up over the beam, which left the basket standing mouth downward over the pit.

When all was ready, the word to haul was given, and the disgusted tiger was lifted up and drawn head foremost into the basket, which fitted him as an extinguisher does a candle end. As soon as he was well in, the Malays swiftly laced withes across the open end, leaving nothing but the tiger's tail protruding.

The basket was now carried to the road, where a cage was in readiness to receive the royal captive. Against a doorway made by drawing up four iron bars the end of the basket was lashed, after which the lacings were cut. The tiger was now free to back out of the strait-jacket of a basket in which he had been carried, but he was unwilling to move, until he had been started by prying his hind-legs backward with levers.

Thus admonished, he made a frantic rush outward to the rear of the cage. The Malays were quick, and in an instant the door bars were dropped, and the tiger was safe.

All that remained was to cut away the basket and to remove the noose from the tiger's neck. He was very violent at first, but when curtains had been placed over the cage he became quiet, and was carried to the city and placed aboard the steamer without any accident.—Young People.

A Sad Scene in Court.

What pathetic incidents occur almost daily in our police courts!

One morning, a short time ago, a woman was arraigned before a justice on the charge of having been found drunk in the street the previous night. When asked if she had anything to say for herself she flushed and trembled, but looked the judge steadily in the face as she replied:

"I can say nothing. I forgot myself, and must bear the consequence."

She was fined five dollars, and as she could not pay, was about to be conducted to prison, when a man, having the appearance of a hard-working mechanic and accompanied by a pretty little girl, rose in the audience and offered to pay it for her. It was her husband. Hearing his voice she hid her face in her hands and said hastily:

"You must not pay it."

"But we want you at home," replied the man, smiling at her pleasantly.

"No; you must not pay it," insisted his wife. "Don't waste the money on me. Use it at home. Buy a new pair of shoes for baby with it."

"Please come home, mamma," said the little girl; and her father silently drew the money from his pocket and handed it to the clerk of the court. But the woman still protested, declaring that she would not go home, and she could go to prison; and it was not until the little girl began to cry and the judge begged her to think of her children that she consented to return. Her husband at length took her by one hand and the child by the other and between them she was led slowly from the court.

O, the curse of intemperance.—N. Y. Ledger.

Blighted Hopes.

Kosciusko Murphy is paying his addresses to Miss Esmerelda Longcoffin. A few days ago he met Esmerelda's little brother on the street:

"Where are you going, little one?" asked Kosciusko Murphy pleasantly.

"I'm going to the store to get something for ma."

"That's right, Tommy, but be careful you don't lose the money."

"There is no danger of me losing any money. We have everything charged to us."

When Tommy, on his return, told Esmerelda what he had said to Mr. Murphy, she shed bitter tears, and so did Tommy. Mr. Murphy had been under the impression that the Longcoffins had money to throw at the birds.

An Indiscreet Wife.

An Austin Israelite has his dwelling and place of business in the same house, which is quite a small one. There were customers in the store when he was, who is a very fine looking Israelitish gentleman, called out to him the other day:

"O, Schon, my dear Schon, come in a minute."

A shade of rage passed over his Hebraic features, and going to where she was he seized her roughly by the arms, and with a swift energy force, hoarse with anger, said:

"Rebecca, does you want to ruin me in my business? What for you call me dem dem Schon, yes? I tells you to be known as dem Schon! Do you want to have dem peoples here call me dem dem?"
