Rabbi Schindler Visits Statesville to Talk About Women in the Bible

discuss "what would the women have said?" Where women are visible, we must study and celebrate their roles.

While comparing "women of strength" in today's world to "courageous" biblical women, the conversation revolved around examples where women leveraged their power and saw positive outcomes. Common threads were how the women elevated those around them, and how the women worked together as a group, combining their collective talents to affect positive change. As Schindler summarized, "These women used their voices, at times risking their lives, to advocate for their own well-being and that of their people. In each of these cases, women managed, in a patriarchal society, to have their voices heard. In each of these cases, kol isha – the woman's voice – was an agent for change and goodness. In each of these cases, strong and courageous women spoke out in difficult circumstances."

Schindler concluded: "I believe the rabbis were correct in their assessment that kol isha – the voice of a woman – has power. Just look at the decades of accomplishments of great women in our country and in our world."
