Vloggers get mixed reception

Firth, who is straight, is president of her college's LGBT and Democratic student groups. She jumped at the opportunity to go to the caucus with ImGay.tv.

"It's kind of concerning to me, that we weren't turned down by anyone at the Obama campaign," Firth continued, "but then coming here to see Bill Clinton, there were many more people who didn't want to see us here."

Writing in his blog on the ImGay.tv website, Freinkle said, "We found the real reason for our problems! The next few attempts were met with negative responses to our being from a gay website. It seems Hillary and Bill supporters are not welcoming to gay people, which I find intriguing."

In a video interview with "power women" Clinton supporters, ImGay.tv staff asked Elizabeth Birch, former Human Rights Campaign executive director, why she supported Clinton when the senator does not support marriage for same-sex couples.

"Every viable candidate for the presidency is not for marriage being extended to gay couples," Birch explained, "I want civil marriage to be extended to gay people over the years. Matrimonial law has always been at the state level. It would be highly unusual for any president to wave a magic wand and say we'd extend marriage to anyone at the federal level, but what Clinton can do is give us the same rights and responsibilities of married couples.

"I think that Hillary Clinton will be clever enough and smart enough to be able to fashion something that can create a bundle of rights for us at the federal level. I trust Clinton to have an honest and intellectual debate."

The ImGay.tv staff plans to continue covering the primaries using video interviews, vlogs and blogs to spotlight the issues LGBT Americans consider important this election season. They encourage individuals to submit video questions for candidates and post their own videos related to the primaries and the presidential race.

When all was said and done, Sen Barack Obama topped out over Sens. John Edwards and Hillary Clinton. Obama received 38 percent of the Democratic Iowa Caucuses, while Edwards garnered 30 percent and Clinton come in third with 29 percent. ▀ stating that Ernest might expose them to his "homosexual paramour."

Bonnoitt said the stipulation was an "unusual restriction ... based on the Husband's self-indulgent and deviant lifestyle" but "necessary to protect the morality of the children."

He added, "The Husband chose an inappropriate relationship over his marriage. He admitted that he undertook a covenant with his wife and with a higher power which was broken. Based on his willingness to break this covenant and pursue an adulterous relationship ... his visitation should be confined to the State of South Carolina to protect the best interest of the minor children."

Bonnoitt further stated that keeping Ernest in-state during visitation would encourage him to remain within the orders of the court and that Ernest would be "less likely to be distracted by the pursuit of his other relationship, and as a result, the children are more likely to receive quality time with their father."

If the children were taken to Florida, Bonnoitt concluded, Ernest would be "more likely to expose the children to a harmful situation including exposure to his paramour who lives out of state."

The appellate court disagreed. "[Bonnoitt] improperly imposed a travel restriction on Husband's visitation with his children," they held. "Absent any evidence that Husband's adulterous conduct endangered or adversely impacted the welfare of his children, we hold the judge impermissibly penalized Husband for his conduct and that it is not in the best interests of the children to uphold the travel restriction." ▀

Florida marriage battle

northern Florida truly are.

The key to winning this fight is enlisting the help of Republican Gov. Charlie Crist. He should be encouraged to follow the example of Ronald Reagan, who as governor of California in 1979 came out against a ballot initiative that would ban gay schoolteachers. With his support, the anti-gay initiative went down in flames.

So far, Crist has been unpredictable. In July, he said he would "probably vote for it," yet, he instructed the Republican Party to stop funding the effort.

"There are things that give me greater concern like cutting property taxes and paying school teachers more," said Crist.

Crist left wiggle room by saying "probably"

and clearly offered his rationale for possibly opposing the measure. Florida Red and Blue has wisely formed a bipartisan coalition and the Republicans involved in this effort should strongly lobby Crist. If our side can place Crist in the shoes of Reagan — every Republican's dream — it can likely win him over.

Florida is a must-win state that will not only help determine who is president, but the future of marriage battles in America. Expect another hot November in the Sunshine State. ▀

— Editor's Note: According to a Dec. 16 Palm Beach Post article on the Florida amendment, Gov. Crist said the issue not one he wants to push. He told the paper, "It's not something that moves me."
