"633 SQUADRON"

It was late in the course of World War II, when the German high command finally realized that they were not going to win the war unless something drastic was done. The bombing of London, while spectacular, and even moderately effective, was not going to do it.

What, the high command asked itself, would do it?

Bigger and better buzz bombs with super-powered rockets to carry them--and thus began Germany's plan to launch super-powered rockets from every land she controlled. And the place to begin was distant Norway, where rocket sites could be hidden in the narrow fjords, shielded from prying eyes and aerial attack by towering narrow mountains.

The greatest secrecy surrounded the enterprise, but news of it leaked out. And England countered--with its famous squadrons of "Mosquito" planes, the "wooden wonders" which actually got into the narrow fjords, bombed and got out of them again.

How it was all done is dramatically told in the color presentation of "633 Squadron" which plays at the GALAX THEATRE on Saturday, June 12.

Starring in the film are Cliff Robertson, George Chakiris, Maria Perschy, Harry Andrews and Donald Houston, with the famous "Mosquito" planes featured.
