"Duffy" is a comedy crime caper, a Columbia Pictures release in Technicolor starring James Mason, James Fox and Savannah York. A Martin Manulis production directed by Robert Parrish, the film is based on a screenplay by Donald Cammell and Harry Joe Brow, Jr.

According to Coburn, "Duffy" has to do with "the contemporary world of psychedelia. The people in it are very sophisticated, very groovy, very psychedelic." He himself appears as an American living in Tangiers, where he concentrates on chicks and chicanery when he isn't working seriously as a modern artist. He takes on the organizing of a multi-million dollar piracy dreamed up by two amoral half-brothers in an effort to "put down" their arrogant tycoon-father, because his share of the loot is impressive; also impressive is the amoral blonde who is romantically involved with one brother. She likes what she sees in Duffy. She, as does Duffy, believes in taking her fun where she finds it.
