KIRBY PAGE SPEAKS FOUR TIMES TO WILSON AUDIENCE

Second, how much is a man entitled to? All he can get is popularly accepted.

Third, competition is the natural legitimate and necessary method for economic.

Fourth, the idea of non-interference of government and economics.

"Similarly the same ideas are applied to the international relations. We accept national interest as the basic drive for effective economy, natural acquisition of maximum power and privilege, international competition bringing about clash of rival imperialisms and militarisms, and the idea that the sovereign state is a state free from any restraint."

Mr. Page put forth an interesting question to the student: body by asking which was more basic for human nature to give expression to—self sacrifice or self interest. The answers were varied. But, according to the speaker, that depended upon the stimulus. He pointed out that a cry for help would call for immediate sacrificial action on the part of volunteers—even to death. Self interest would, in such cases, be in the background.

On this assumption, Mr. Page built the framework for discourse, showing the hopeful aspect with which the so-called chaotic situation can be viewed.

He clearly indicated that the four premises stated are natural for men to give expression to. Likewise, the premises are natural tendencies for nations to express. Yet, he showed, these premises cannot be accepted without serious consequences with modern war.

fare. It is possible to change or redirect these natural tendencies. "That is," he said, "it is just as natural to be unselfish as it is to be selfish. There is, therefore, the need of substituting, for those accepted, false premises the following: mutual for self interest among people and nation, fair share of economic opportunity for all-you-can-get idea, international organization in mutual benefits for idea of competition, and international cooperation being subject to international law for present idea of untouchable superstatus."

"This calls for the sowing of new seeds. We have the dilemma present, for, this generation must sow the new seeds while it is reaping the consequences of the bad seeds sown by our forefathers. We cannot avoid some of the evil consequences of the past sowing.

"The challenge remains clear. How can we live in such an hour when processes of life seem to be collapsing? How can we proceed in an hour of trial—sowing the new seeds in the face of the consequences of the old seeds?"

Both afternoon meetings at the Negro High School and at the International Relations Club were more informal. They were of the general discussion type.

The night session at the Carolina Room of the Christian Church attracted many prominent thinkers of Wilson. At this meeting, Mr. Page presented his policy of pacifism based on "the ways of force and struggle as exemplified by Barnabas and the Jesus way on men violence.

Here the dangers of war and its effects were clearly indicated. Mr. Page showed that something happens to a people when they fight. There is a shift in issues and a shift from the original ideals for which the war started. "The victor becomes embittered and harsh. The vanquished country is dealt with severely as Germany was. The vanquished are crushed and ground down, but they eventually rise up, more bitter than ever. Nothing has been settled by war."

RELATIONS CLUB HEADED BY SUBER, IS REORGANIZED

(Continued From Front Page) that we should help China," stated Mr. Barclay, "what will we do to help? The following action has been proposed: that we refrain from helping Japan, by refusing to grant them loans and refusing to sell them munitions; that we grant loans and military aid in China."

The Japanese are continuing to push further into China. The Chinese are slow-moving people, and have heretofore been reluctant to leave their homes. Now they are being forced westward, and settling on farms. They will probably start some modern method of farming, and this will be an impetus to a great change in Chinese living.

When Mr. Barclay finished the lecture, he answered questions which were presented to him by members of the club.

C. H. HAMLIN WRITES BOOKLET

The author makes clear that academic freedom is denied in American colleges during war. According to Mr. Hamlin, only Harvard among the larger institutions of higher learning in this country took a stand for academic freedom that compared favorably with the stand of British universities. Even the Association of University Professors seemed to favor the dismissal of "unpatriotic" instructors for lack of enthusiasm in endorsing the war.

One of the most interesting sections of the pamphlet is that devoted to the study of "War Work of Women in Colleges." An account of this phase of the question during the next war will probably have to be expanded. But they had thought of most everything back in 1918 that it is possible to do to interest women in the war business. It will only remain to put these ideas into speedy practice, unless

Mr. Hamlin has written for a purpose. He believes in education as a saving process. If we are informed about what has been done in the past perhaps we shall not be so easily "sold" again. That is the only hope we have of averting another American war. How well founded is that hope? The answer can be given only by those of the younger generation. Reading this pamphlet will help you frame your answer.
