Day Students Have Budget

By JOYCE COPELAND

The Day Students have a budget. An Oct. 20 mini-meeting of the Executive Board provided $150 for the newly constitutionalized organization. A request for $200 was refused on the grounds that it would take too large a hunk out of the general fund with only a half semester of school behind us.

The bulk of the allocation was designated to a news letter. The board questioned whether or not the publication would serve its original purpose of involving the Day Students in campus affairs. It was suggested that the Day Students might consider the possibility of a Day Student editor for the COLLEGIATE.

The $200 budget was cut to $165, then to $100 and finally expanded to the accepted total of $150.

Other business of the evening included approving a vice-presidential election for the sophomore class and the request to the administration to place students on the Student Life, Commencement, and Curriculum Committees.

Riot Leaves None Injured

By BEN CASEY

No, we haven't yet received our official Berkeley status, but ACC students were enlightened in their routines of going to class and chapel last Wednesday. Students were entertained by a display of fire and flower power. Dick Jester, Tom Martin, Cynthia Mercer, and Georgette Evans were present in the student center last week with a display of propoganda in opposition to that offered for consumption by the U. S. Marines. These "hippies," as independent students, had to go through normal channels to establish their display and be declared as guests of the college. This was a precedent.

In an interview with these individuals, Tom Martin stated that their purpose was, "to present the other side of war." Jester stated that he was motivated by "Pacifism: I feel responsible for guilt of what my country does. . .denocide, suppression, thought control, and imperialism." When asked what kind of reaction they were expecting, Jester replied, "Apathetic."

Jester and company were in store for a surprise. They were not confronted with an extreme display of overpowering intellectual superiority. Instead the confrontation came as the result of a collection spearheaded by Tim Overman to purchase all of the material available in this haven of flower power. Overman led about fifty other students in a verbal engagement with the hippies, after which Overman and company persuaded the flower people to sell them their literature on how to leave the country to escape the draft. Jester and Martin refused to sell all the material to one person, but did consent to sell the material to individuals under the promise that they would read it. Such was not the case. Immediately following this transaction, Jester was "surprised" to learn that the material was being collected by Overman for a "cremation" outside the student center.

Jester later stated that he was extremely exhilarated at this response for the evidence of the reactionary backlash represented progress. He classified the mood of the "burning group" as that of a "fear of Communism, with their duty to country being represented by a blind nationalism."

Overman said that he asked Martin what he would do if he, Overman, struck him, and Overman reported that Martin replied that he would hit him back. Martin on the other hand calls himself a pacifist, who would in the case of another Hitler, "organize himself into a non-violent defense." In response to a question about patriotism, Jester had "no comment" saying that it would be necessary for people to talk to him personal-
