The 49 residents of Jones Hall are having something to smile about these days.

They still do not have their own housekeeper five days a week, but they do have Wanda Stacker to clean the bathrooms, mop floors, take out trash, and sanitize showers.

"Because housekeeping is understaffed it is hard to keep up, Stacker a temporary housekeeper for Jones Hall, said.

One housekeeper is assigned to clean five dorms. Player Hall has two housekeepers because of its size.

"I am doing the best that I can with the housekeepers that I have to work with," Kathryn Lawson, supervisor of housekeeping said.

"I'm glad that our bathrooms are in better condition, even though we still do not have our own housekeeper," Adrienne Betts, a biology major from Maryland, said.

Students continue complaining about new security policies

The recent steps taken by security to watch over the flow of traffic on campus are causing some students to be concerned.

"The gates that are supposed to control the rate of people entering the campus unlawfully is holding the students out, but it's not keeping others away," said Kimya Stoute, senior political science major. Some students said they feel that the gates aren't securing them, but instead restraining them from doing things that they need done on campus.

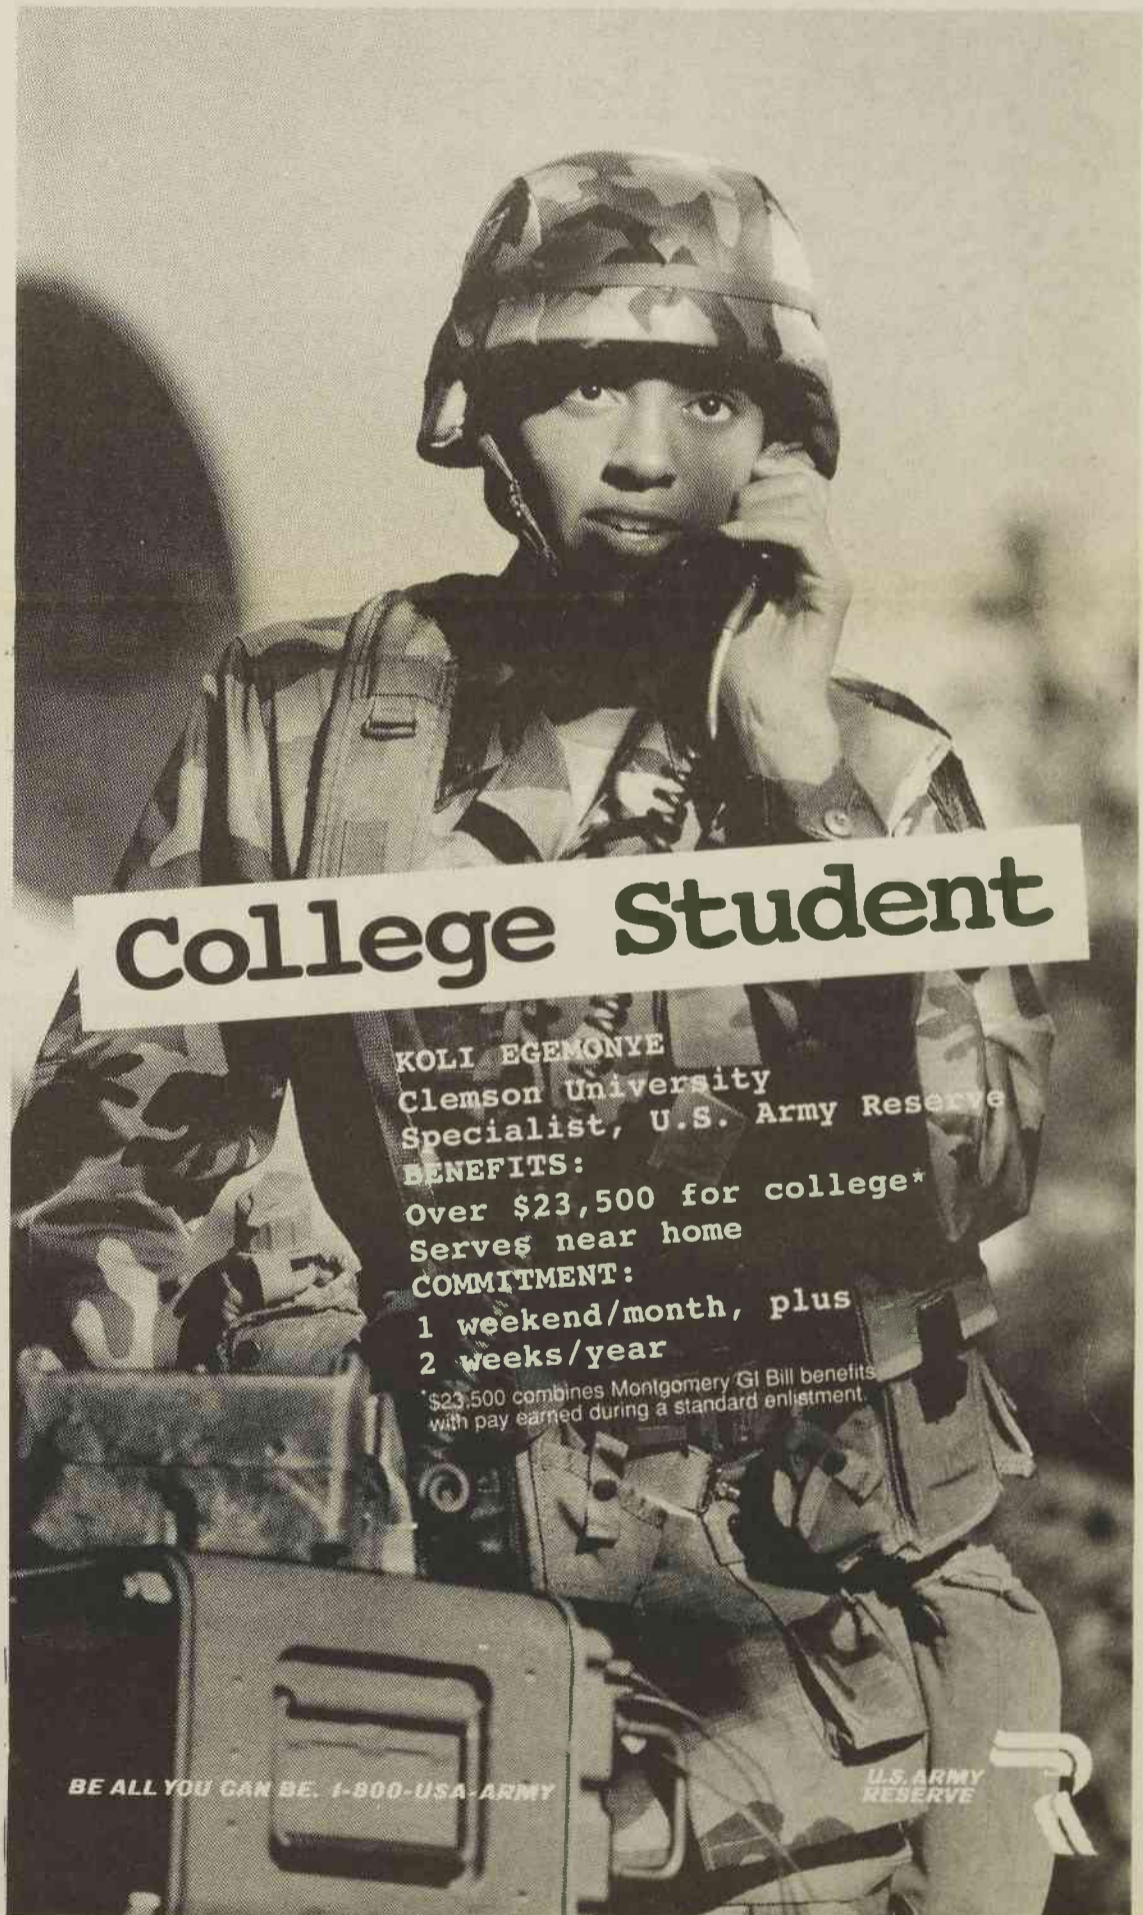

"I needed assistance from security last week to load my car because I had no other help and I was denied help or to even drive closer to the dorm by Officer Thretha Chance.

According to Barbara Simmons, chief of campus police, students are provided an escort and help whenever assistance is needed.

"I'm sorry if anyone is denied an escort when it is requested, but in order for me to make sure that the officers are providing assistance, I need to know when students have problems," Simmons said.

"Students are allowed to pull near their dorms when they have to load or unload, but must remain in the paved spots," the security chief added.
