'In Search ...' provides satisfying reading journey

In search of satisfaction?

In search of happiness?

Do you believe that love conquers all?

If you have answered yes to any of these questions then you should read "In Search of Satisfaction," a compelling tale of two sisters by J. California Cooper.

Cooper has written a story about Yingyang and Ruth, their children, and the town where they were from during the late 1890's. The story takes place in Yoville "...a legal township founded by the rich for their own personal use..."

At one time Yoville was the home of a freed slave, Josephus and his daughters, Yingyang and Ruth. Because of untimely circumstances surrounding the death of Josephus, Yingyang and Ruth were on an empowered search for the legacy that Josephus left behind.

During their search, the sisters meet a variety of people that may or may not be human. Cooper adds a special ingredient to her plot by making the Devil one her main characters.

Ultimately the key to Cooper's tale deals with two forms of satisfaction: The satisfaction one may receive from an achievement, and the satisfaction one may receive from deception.

Cooper's characters—the two sisters—do not know that they are indeed searching for happiness -- a happiness lost with the death of their father and loss of many other loved ones throughout this book.

But as Cooper writes, "Do not depend on anyone else for your happiness... TIME is used to build our minds, our tool to get some satisfaction. Our minds decide the quality of our lives."

The Critic's Corner accepts reviews, previews and criticisms of music, books, poetry, plays and movies that are 150 words or less. Articles must not have been published elsewhere. Once submitted, an article becomes the property of the Bennett Banner and may be edited.
