major," Williams said.

Students interested in the WLI's work will have a chance to lead and facilitate the dialogues on issues concerning women on both campuses. The tentative opening date is Oct. 7.

Whitmore, vice president of the African-American Cultural Society on Guilford's campus, sees the program as some good exposure to diversity.

-McKissick-Melton

"This is a new step for me," Whitmore said. "I have usually worked within the black community -- only."

Whitmore said that one of her goals for the program is to take Guilford out of its isolation and involve it with the general Greensboro community.

She said that Sister-to-Sister will eventually include other area colleges including Greensboro College, and North Carolina A & T State University.

"Any program that would sponsor sisterhood among African-American women has to be good in any community, especially in Guilford county," said Charmaine McKissick-Melton, an assistant professor in the Mass Communications, Speech and Theatre Department.

"There is some real value in all women getting together on real issues."

Jamila McFarlane, a junior business administration major from New York said, "I believe it is great to get the women of Guilford and Bennett together to discuss the issues of social injustice and racism. But it [Sister-to-Sister] shouldn't be limited to African-American women because all women experience some type of social or racial injustice."

Like the recent WLI town meetings, the Sister-to-Sister sessions will take place in one of the dorms.

"The town meeting chat [in Barge Hall parlor] was really good," said Niaomi Jefferson, business administration Bennett freshman from Connecticut.

"The one I attended called 'Women Leaders in Contemporary Society' showed us that problems from the past could be used to resolve similar conflicts today.

"Another series of similar dialogues dealing with any other different issues for women of the different colleges will no doubt be really good," Jefferson said.
