GREENWOOD GIVES ADVICE

Every Little Nut and Screw Plays Big Part; "Are You A Loose Nut In Your Department?"

And WE shall all be members one of another.

How many of us realize when we are watching these new and wonderful machines in our factory while they are in operation, that each groove, each tiny tap, each small screw, has a most important part to play in the mechanism of the machines as a whole? If a groove becomes worn, a tap is lost, a screw becomes loose, the entire machine ceases to function properly. Each part of a machine is dependent upon all of the other parts, and vice-versa.

Just so we employees who operate the machines, whether they be typewriters or wheelbarrows, are dependent one upon another—and the whole family of workers upon each individual. You and I have a task to do, a part to play, to keep the work of this factory running smoothly. Do you carry your part of the load? Do you keep yourself as fit as you would wish your machine to be kept? When something goes wrong in your department, are you the loose screw? Are you the worn groove? If so, get a hump on yourself. Remember, you must be your own loom-fixer.

Our lives are measured by seconds. A few seconds of idleness (when you should be working) right here in the Chatham Mill could mar your own and many other lives. Maybe you have never thought of it but you and your time are just as important as this little article would have you believe you are.

Get a lesson from the machines, the tools you work with. If you have a job that is termed lowly, keep in mind that the best position here is dependent upon your job. Do it well. Try to make yourself think that you can do it better than anyone else, but it has been truly said that no one ever stepped out of a place that another and better one could not be found to step in and fill it. Do you like your job? Keep it—you can if you try.
