Piano Neophytes Give Recital

Friday afternoon, December 4, at five o'clock, the class beginning piano in September gave its first recital in the voice studio with Miss Clay and Miss Hatcher directing.

The program presented was as follows: "Lightly Row," played by Florida Swan; William Craver and Adeline Rogers played a duet entitled "Evening". Creston Taylor presented, in a unique manner, "Good Night, Ladies." Lee Henry Eagles also played "Lightly Row". Rachel Orr appeared fifth on the program, playing "In the Gloaming"; William Craver played as a solo "Largo". Frances McRae, not an enrolled college student, played "Satges Gwys" Dorothy Dean played the well-loved "Santa Lucia"; Odell Salmon presented "O Sole Mio"; "Holy Night" was played by Sharleen Wells; Martha Albert played "Water Sprite".

Both Miss Clay and Miss Hatcher were well pleased with the playing of this group of students who hardly knew the position of middle C when they began the course in September. Most of these students are continuing this course during the coming quarter.

Those Awful Black Marks!

By Mary Palmer

Take this advice from a poor, little, timid, ignorant, scared-to-death (but much wiser otherwise) freshman and beware of those horrible horizontal black marks.

A few days after my arrival, I was casually sauntering down the corridor at a break-neck speed when Miss Hayes pounced on me. "What do you mean by running down the hall; don't you know it's quiet hour and besides, you're liable to knock somebody's head off?" I was so amazed and shocked that I could only stare in astonishment. This produced a dumb, cow-like look, and Miss Hayes clicked her heels and walked spryly off. Several minutes later a black mark was accredited to my account.

After slaving several hours in the dish-washing department of the KILLOUGH SOUP JOINT, I grabbed the elevator to the second floor; and who should greet me but Miss Smith. She had her hands on her hips and was knitting her brows. I said sugarly, "Hello, Miss Smith. What are you knitting on Sunday for?" She replied in annoyed tones, "Shut up your nonsense. This room is awful! What's that bobby pin doing on the floor? Miss Hayes, bring me my glasses! I do believe I see a scrap of paper." I knew what she meant—score number two. Could I have stood it!

After a few wee minutes had passed and I was over most of my fright, I timidly gathered up a sock and handkerchief and stepped meekly down the hall. Getting a small bit bolder, I ducked the sock in one lavatory and the handkerchief in another. About two and two-thirds of a second later I saw Miss Hayes' toe coming around the door. I jumped in the trash can just in time to save my neck, because she surely was on the war-path. Why she actually yelled in a loud voice (and it was quiet hour), "Whose garments are these?" All the time I kept getting hotter and hotter. I did not relish the breath-taking atmosphere. When I found out

Pertelote Contracts Are Awarded

Contracts for the printing, binding, photography, and engraving of the college yearbook "The Pertelote" have been awarded, according to Harold Severs, business manager of the publication.

The printing and binding contract has been awarded to The Miller Press, of Asheville, N. C. The photographs will be finished by the Austin Studio, local photographers. The John and Ollier Engraving Company of Chicago, Illinois, will do the engraving.

An extensive advertising campaign will be launched immediately after the Christmas holidays.

Leighton Presson, of Charlotte, editor-in-chief of the publication, has returned and has begun work on various literary phases of the book.

The "Pertelote" staff has not, as yet, been completely selected, but will probably be arranged by the first of the year and work on the book will then be started in full swing.

Taylor Hall Council Meets

The Taylor Hall Council held a meeting last Wednesday night for the purpose of acquainting the new council members with their duties and to elect a president to serve for the second quarter.

Tom Peeler was elected president by a very small majority over Ed Swann, who was unanimously elected secretary of the council.

Concert Artist

Mr. Paul Curtis, prominent tenor soloist of New York, gave a concert to the student body last Wednesday morning at the assembly period.

Mr. Curtis' program was composed of German and English songs which were enthusiastically received by the student body and a number of visitors.

Mr. Curtis was accompanied at the piano by Miss Mary Brooks, of Hendersonville, N. C.
