BC Is Snowballed By Mountain Weather

Drifts of white greeted students returning to Brevard for the spring semester. Although many were unable to reach the college because of bad road conditions, those who did took advantage of the opportunities offered to them by the snow.

Ross Hall became the site of sledding activities, and the hedge there will never be the same. Some were lucky enough to possess sleds, while most used lunchroom trays. A few people rode on signs and others employed personal facilities. Camp Straus also offered great fun with its steep hills, but the walk there wasn't as appealing.

The Floridians, some seeing snow for the first time, were enthralled with the light, lovely flakes. And sledding undoubtedly became one of their favorite sports despite the scratches and bruises that resulted from collisions and spills.

To North Carolinians and Northerners the snow was nothing unusual. It only meant a day or two of fun and then a week of slippery roads, wet, soggy ground, and transportation problems.

Most of the snow is gone now, but according to a reliable source, we will be blessed with three more snows this winter.

It used to take me all vacation to grow a new hide in place of the one they flogged off me during school term.

"SNOW" was on everyone's lips last week at BC as students frolicked in the frozen stuff. Ross Hall looked like Innsbruck with its hordes of sledders. The fun was tiring though, and one enthusiast (lower right) took advantage of the lull to lean back and dream about spring.
