

Students Campaign Against Hunger

by Anne-Marie Pressler

USA for Africa and the student leaders from 1,000 colleges and high schools in fifty states have joined together in a student campaign against world hunger. The campaign is entitled, "So Let's Start Giving: The National Student Campaign Against Hunger." The campaign is being organized by the student Public Interest Research Groups (PIRGs) which are based on over 100 campuses.

"Students have been among the strongest supporters for USA for Africa," said Amy Carter. She feels we must commit ourselves to the struggle to end world hunger.

Co-author, Lionel Richie, of the hit single "We Are The World" feels that this is the student's chance to campaign against world hunger. He was quoted as saying, "You are the hope of the future." He goes on to say that we must give our time, talent, and energy to begin building that future now.

Ken Kragen, Founder and President of USA for Africa, feels we have reached many people through USA for Africa. He also says that this campaign enables us to build leadership for the future.

"The campaign will have a three-part focus; GIVE: fund raisers to benefit USA for Africa; LEARN: educational events to deepen understanding about hunger; and ACT: local projects to attack hunger in the United States," said Patty Dorsey, chairperson of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and a student at Boston College.

Students who conduct the most creative and effective projects in each category will be honored at the World Hunger Media Awards ceremony by USA for Africa at the United Nations this November. The World Hunger Media Awards are sponsored by Kenny and Marianne Rogers.

"We look forward to working with the campaign and helping to honor those students who conduct the most successful campaigns in their schools and communities," said Marty Rugol, Executive Director of USA for Africa.

'Targets' Is Tim Murray's New Art Exhibit

by Heather Kivett

Tim Murray's art exhibit "Targets" will be on display in the art building from October 17th through November 14th. The show consists of 12 paintings and three wood sculptures. Two of the paintings are not here on campus because they are at the October show in Asheville.

Murray began work on the show last March. He named it "Targets" because all the paintings reflect people in vulnerable positions. Each life size piece has a paper airplane in it somewhere, and a cross which intersects the figure at a vulnerable point. The paintings are vibrant and lively. Their titles are: "The Water Was Cold at Gizeh That Night," "Shadow Search," "North Side Search," "One of Four," "Target," "Swan Song," "Generalissimo," "Robinhood Roost," "Five Finger Fantasy," and "Night Dancer."

The sculptures are fascinating combinations of smooth flowing lines and violently sharp ones. Their titles are: "Heartbreak Pass," "Table Fedish," and "Tree Island." One of these pieces is capable of movement.

One of the paintings struck a deep chord within me-"North Side Search." This piece was disquieting to look at but the unrest of it was what I liked. The figure reminded me of my own pain and searching. I recommend that everyone take a few minutes to go into the art building and look at this show

Buckle Up For Safety

The new seatbelt law for front seat passengers went into effect the first of October in North Carolina. Yet according to the Transylvania County police department, tickets will not be issued until January 1st of 1987. Warning tickets will be issued until '87, but no fines will be given.

The seatbelt law does not apply to adults riding in the back seat, yet all children under the age of six must be secured whether in the front or back seat. Why start the law in '85 if no fines will be given until '87? An officer at the Brevard police department feels "it is to get people used to the idea."
