American Hero

Question: What's more American than the wild, wild west? (And I'm not talking about the movie.) Answer: This week's American Hero; the Dallas Police Department. The DPD really took the American-ness up a notch, even for the wild wild west. Last week, following an illegal U-turn, a Dallas woman was pulled over and ticketed for 3 offenses- Disregarding a traffic control device, failure to present a license... and "being a non-English speaking driver." Even more heinous was the DPD's admission of having ticketed some 39 drivers over the past several years for the same offense. Further, this offense is actually a punishable crime. For being a non-English speaking driver in Dallas, you could get fined over $200. Fortunately for those who have already been ticketed and paid their dues to society, once the story broke, the Dallas Police refunded the fines, and to all those who had been ticketed but had not been before a judge, the charge was dropped. Editor's note: This is not an actual Dallas city law, however it has been enforced as though it were. Therefore, for going above and beyond the call of duty, going above and beyond the law, and doing everything you can to ensure that the melting pot of cultures in America stays as English as shepherd's pie, we salute you, Dallas Police Department!
