American Hero

What is more American than making sure everyone knows what you're up to at all times? Maybe ensuring that justice is always carried out, be it in Iraq with Saddam or on the home front with fugitives from the law? Better yet, what if these two American practices were combined? That would make for a true American Hero. In upstate New York, a fugitive, Chris Crego did just this. Unfortunately for him, he the fugitive that he turned in was himself. After going on the lam in the fall after being charged with failure to appear at a sentencing for an assault charge, drunk driving and several other crimes, police found his facebook page, which all but told them where to find him. He listed his job information and virtually all information needed to find and arrest him on that page. The police should their gratitude for his ineptly Good Samaritan ways by leaving a message on his Fcaebook wall saying, "It was due to your diligence in keeping us informed that now you are under arrest." For keeping our streets safer, even if this is accomplished because he's not on them anymore, we salute Chris Crego, this week's American Hero.
