The best TV you've never seen

By Alex McCracken
Staff Reporter

A few years back ABC green lit the kind of shows that never ever get green lit. They were high off the success of Lost and decided a couple other left field shows couldn't hurt.

One of these shows was Better off Ted. I feel the best way to describe it would be a cross between Dilbert and Malcolm in the Middle. Malcolm because the eponymous Ted frequently breaks into soliloquy and Dilbert because it's one of the darkest office based comedies ever aired on network TV.

Not that it's ever noticeably depressing, the show never stops slinging killer one liners and character moments long enough for you dwell on its darker subtext. No, Better off Ted is actually my go-to bad mood show. It's upbeat and electric characters wrestling with racism, sexual politics, edible space moss, co-worker death, and the military application of pumpkins never fail to put a smile on my face.

But you're probably wondering how one goes about weaponizing pumpkins. It's a fair question and its one that Ted Crisp's team of researchers and quality assurance testers are paid to answer. They work for Viridian Dynamics, a multinational conglomerate that will do literally anything to turn a buck.

Veronica: "The company loves its money, Ted. If they could, they'd go to strip clubs and throw naked women at money."

That's Ted's immediate superior, a character that Arrested Development's Portia De Rossi absolutely kills. On that note there really aren't any characters on the show that are underacted or written.

You just have to get with the vibe the show tries to give off, a cartoonish reflection of the complicated reality of the corporate grind. Once you can take things like motion detectors that can't see black people in stride, it will burrow into a corner of your TV loving heart and stay there for a really really long time.

Veronica: The company's position is that it's actually the opposite of racist, because it's not targeting black people. It's just ignoring them. They insist the worst people can call it is "indifferent."

The show is only available streaming from Netflix.
