

Life, love, holidays

"I Love You" — at Christmastime

For the next few weeks, my love,
I will walk the malls
to find the perfect gift.

I will search my mind,
for the ideal present
that will forever capture your heart.

Just like last Christmas,
it will probably be a tie or something of that sort,
however, do not feel unloved.

The book I gave you last year is still unread.
The pajamas that seemed so warm, still peek through a plastic seal.
The ever matching tie never goes well with much of anything.
The grey suit, black shoes, and cap were too short,
too narrow and too small.

Yes, again this year — for you,
I will try to find the perfect gift
that will forever capture your heart.

Of course, I will try to find a way to wrap my heart in a material surprise, so that you will always remember this Christmas.

At Christmastime, I will say, "I Love You," that you have my heart for now and for always and that life is so complete with you.

Yes...at Christmastime, my love,
I'll give you the rarest gift of all.

It is the gift of everlasting GOLD.
It is the gift of a lover's HEART,
It is the gift of my SOUL.

At Christmas time, I will say, "I Love You."

Life

No beginning, no ending in the soul
Brief moments of happiness, eternal moments of sadness
Trying to love, trying to learn, trying to be

The struggle begins from day one you see

A plant an animal a Human being,
each striving to find meaning

Folks just folks like you and me, who never had much and what we did have didn't come easy, sometimes we have the most to give —

That is worthwhile

Eyes no longer flowing with tears just dry, and tired.

But we keep on, just keep on knowing and believing in what we do.

I want to love, he wants to love, we want to love
so our lives will be sweeter

My life, your life, trying to touch the intangible, feel the hardest, move the immobile and just love the unloveable...

Mondale

The Gallup Poll showed Jackson first among black voters with 39 percent, although Mondale was close behind with 30 percent. Glenn was a distant third with 12 percent.

In the Carolina Poll, Mondale also led among Democrats regardless of age bracket, although his greatest support came from older people. He received 52 percent support from voters 54 and older and 51 percent from those between 40 and 53. Glenn's strongest base was among the oldest group, where he received 20 percent support, and Jackson's strength was among the 18-29-year-old voters, where he was the choice of 11 percent.

Mondale had more support among men (51 percent) than women (40 percent), while Jackson was the reverse, 9 percent among women and 3 percent among men. Glenn was about even, with 17 percent support from men and 14 percent from women.

The only category where Glenn was the leader was among Republicans who responded to the poll questions. Thirty-one percent of those who generally vote Republican said Glenn would make the best president. Twenty-three percent chose Mondale, and McGovern and Hollings tied for third with 6 percent.

The Carolina Poll, sponsored by the UNC-CH School of Journalism and the UNC Center for Public Television, is based on a random sample of persons 18 years old or older. Telephone numbers were randomly selected by computer and the person over 18 in that household who was to have the next birthday was asked to respond to 30 questions about current issues. Household size was weighted in computing the answers to contribute to the randomness of the survey.

The poll has an overall sampling error of 4 percent. The sampling error for the subgroup of 274 respondents who said they generally vote Democratic is 6 percent. This means that if every telephone in the state had been dialed, 95 percent of the time the answers would have varied by no more than 6 percentage points up or down. ■
