Exploration of Ice Cap Continuing

By ARTHUR RIDDLE

Now that IGY (the International Geophysical Year) and arctic expeditions have gone down in the history books, many people don't realize that the days of arctic exploration are not over. Indeed man's knowledge of the ice cap is limited.

The Arctic ice cap affects the world's climate significantly, on a large scale. It is also a very important strategic factor in US and Soviet naval operations, or military strategy.

Many scientists want to understand the behavior of the ice cap on a large scale, for these and other reasons. They especially want to know how the ice cap affects the climate, as well as why and how it changes in structure and size.

In the spring of 1973, a hopefully international effort to study the ice cap will begin. It will be called AIDJEX, for "Arctic Ice Dynamics Joint Experiment." A number of U.S. Government agencies, Canadian and US universities, and Canadian agencies are expected to participate in the experiments. It is hoped that other countries will also participate.

Many of the AIDJEX experiments will be conducted from manned and unmanned "drifting stations" in the Arctic Ocean, and by aerial photography. The experimentation will probably go on for a year with data processing expected to take 5 more years.

It is hoped that the new knowledge will make it possible to predict natural and man-induced changes in the ice cap.

Foreign Students Are Interviewed

EDITOR'S NOTE: Monica Machien Yin is from Chinese Embassy, San Jose, Costa Rica. Her father is a government employee. She speaks Chinese, Spanish, and English fluently. Below is a resume in her own words of her life, education, experiences, and professional objectives.

"I was born in the year 1951 in Santiago, Chile, of Chinese parentage. My father, who had fled the mainland of China to Taiwan, had just arrived in South America with my mother, on a diplomatic appointment. So, as a child, I learned to speak Chinese at home and Spanish outside. At the age of five, I was sent to the kindergarten of an English-speaking school named Santiago College. There I remained until I finished my third year of primary school. At the age of eight, I followed my family to Taiwan, where my father had been transferred.

"On the way from Chile to Taiwan I had the opportunity to visit several countries along the route. I particularly recall the interesting tour driving through the United States from the East coast to the West, visiting many cities, national parks and monuments. To this day I retain a most vivid impression of the beautiful northeastern countryside. It was in the fall and the air seemed so invigorating. Since then I often dreamed how nice it would be if I could come back here to complete my studies one day.

"We reached Taiwan in January 1960, and there I came into my first contact with the people of my forefathers. Almost immediately, I was enrolled in a Chinese primary school, the Tsai Hsing Primary School, where with some extra tutoring, I soon caught up with their curriculum. Unfortunately, just as I had learned to read and write enough Chinese to enjoy normal schooling, my father was again transferred abroad, and I had to go along. But I was glad to have had this opportunity to form a basis for keeping up with my Chinese.

"In the spring of 1962, I found myself with my family in San Jose, Costa Rica, where I joined the Lincoln School and was graduated in February, 1970. This year in the month of July, my father was requested home to Taiwan, and I remained in Costa Rica, as I have become a Costa Rican citizen.

"I am the youngest of the family, with two brothers before me. The eldest is now 24 years old and attending university in the U. S. The other one is now 20, also considering college education. This is the main reason for my applying for a scholarship, since my father, detached from his home base on the mainland of China, is not in a financial position to see us all through college at one and the same time.

"In thinking of my college career and of the possible ways that I might make myself useful to society, I have come to the tentative conclusion that I might perhaps take advantage of my language experiences, and go on from there; but I would like to make a broader use of this condition and not be limited to pure philological studies. I hope that my ultimate objective might be something associated with international services of some kind."

RECORD REVIEW

By JAY SIDNER

"HIGH TIME"

By The MC 5 On Atlantic 8285

It seems almost too perfectly ironic that now, at a time in their career when most people have written them off as either dead or dying, the MC5 should power back into action with the first record that comes close to telling the tale of their legendary reputation and attendant charisma. This may appear particularly surprising, even the fact that the group's live performances have been none to cosmic of late, but then the old saw in that you can't keep a good band down, and its' never been more forcefully put than here.

Which is not to say that HIGH TIME is a perfect album, by any means. Most of side two, with the exception of a lovely little chorus run in Fred Smith's "Over and Over," doesn't hang together exceptionally well. A large part of the songs seem incomplete, written around chord progressions that quickly wear thin and words that display the lower edge of the school of right-on lyrics. Rob Tyner's "Future Now" is the greatest offender in this case, and through there are some nice moves towards freerform sound on sound toward the end, nothing ultimately is developed or carried through. Wayne Kramer's "Poison" is a little better, opening with a lightning-like series of guitar exchanges, but when Rob comes in spitting words like "Nature, and Peace," one is reminded of nothing so much as the Chambers Brothers on a particularly V-signed night. Things come to a crashing finale with "Skunk", which moves well for its first half of good ol' kick-em out rock, and then dies a tragicomic death with the addition of some out of place horns.

But if the second side leaves much to be desired, side one is a none-boner classic. "Sister Anne", about a nun who "doesn't give a damn about re-vo-lu-tion She's a liberated woman, she got her solutions", is a top-flight piece of work in the old tradition. The MC5 whatever you might have felt were their other faults, always know how to play those I-IV-V progressions like nobody's business, and they're at their finest here. The song is put together like a charm, with a great kicking piano and a long soaring coda that carries you without a hitch into a bizarre - Salvation Army instrumental at the end. Very good, any way you look at it, and if there was ever a suspicion that the MC5 would never learn their way around the recording studio, let it be quietly put to rest now.

"Sister Anne" is only the beginning. "Baby won't Ya" takes on where the Salvation Army leaves off, all rollicking choruses and guitar breaks. Rob's voice sounds strong and sure throughout, and when he hits the line about how "A lovely senorita took me by the hand She said 'Whoo baby, won't ya be my man';" its easily worth another notch on the volume dial. From there, it's tossed to Wayne and "Miss X," a raggingly beautiful cut, helped along by a massive organ, incredible words, and a superb arrangement.

The record, though, is saved for Dennis Thompson: his "Gotta Keep Movin'" not only defines the MC5 in the way that all of us would like to remember them throughout the past dismal year, but also manages to pull in every trick that literally made them the most exciting band in America for a brief and glorious time. It's all there, the precise breaks, the madly screaming dual guitars, the fanatic drive and energy. Make no mistake, they shovel it out as good as it ever gets, and that's pretty good indeed.

Catching Up

We suppose the sociologist and anti-women's lib will have a field day with a recent FBI report.

The female crime rate for most offenses is rising faster than the male rate. That, at least, is what police records show over the past 10 years.

No doubt the gals will plead human, capable of all human frailties. Hard for the cynics to refute....Atlanta (Ga.) Journal
