

Carolyn At Her Machine In Dungaree Department

Carolyn English Faces Crisis

Carolyn English of Dungaree Department is a young mother who is facing a crisis in her life with strength and courage which her co-workers are silently applauding.

When Carolyn's baby, Johnny, was three months old she took him to the doctor for his regular three months check up. The doctor found that the baby was not focusing his eyes as he should, but this inability to focus is found in many young babies.

However, some weeks later Carolyn was called home from her job at Anvil Brand and found the baby in a coma. After being admitted to the hospital here and several days' examination, the baby was transferred to the Baptist Hospital in Winston-Salem. Extensive tests there revealed the baby was suffering from a rare blood disease and tests on Carolyn showed she has the same condition.

The medical name for the disease is toxicplasmose and Carolyn says she has been told by the doctors that it could be fatal at any time. Also there is no known cure for the condition.

Doctors at the Winston-Salem Hospital suggested to Carolyn that she and her baby let their names be submitted to a hospital in Bethesda, Md., where research is being done on this type of disease. "The doctors have told me that although my baby and myself may not be cured, perhaps by submitting ourselves to tests, something may be found that will help someone in the future," Carolyn said.

For several weeks, when this story was being written in late

April, Carolyn had had her bags packed ready to go at a moment's notice to Bethesda. She said the doctors in Winston-Salem had informed her at that time that her name still was on the waiting list at the hospital in Maryland and that she could expect to be called at any time.

Carolyn speaks calmly of her condition and says frankly that she has not experienced any suffering, other than some bad headaches. She said she wanted to thank all her many friends in the Dungaree Department for the gift of money which they presented her and for other kindnesses they have shown.

Esther Hughes, Carolyn's supervisor, said, "I have never seen anyone so young (Carolyn is just 19) face a situation like this so beautifully. She has been an inspiration to all of us."

Carolyn came to work for Anvil Brand a little over a year ago and returned after a leave of absence to have her baby. She and her husband, John, who works in a local hosiery plant, are residents of Route Three.

MR. RUNDO STRESSES NEED FOR QUALITY

BY PAUL RUNDO
Sales Coordinator

Quality workmanship creates a satisfied customer.

Anvil Brand has built its reputation on quality that is "Hard to Beat." Everyone in every department must be on guard to protect this quality reputation.

A satisfied customer looks for quality in style, in fabric, in finish, in the details of workmanship in every garment. This includes neat stitching, clean button holes, no loose threads, a good finish at the pressing table. This puts the garment on the shelf of the retail store where the retailer is proud to show it. The customer then buys the garment for he is pleased by the eye-catching good looks and long carefree wear of Anvil Brand.

A slight slip such as a pucker in a seam or a wrinkle in the fly can many times be the difference in making a sale or losing not only a sale but perhaps a customer.

Quality makes satisfied customers and satisfied customers make jobs for Anvil Brand employees.

JOHNNY

HUDSON GETS SAFETY AWARD—Hudson Division was honored recently by the North Carolina and United States Departments of Labor when the plant was recognized for completing two consecutive years with no lost-time accidents. The award was a blue ribbon which is placed on the certificate which was given at the completion of the first accident-free year. Ossie Wright, left above, Anvil's Safety Director, accepted the award at a luncheon meeting at the YMCA. Frank Crane, right above, N. C. Commissioner of Labor, made the presentation. Mrs. Wright noted that in recent years Sherrod Division qualified for a two-year accident free ribbon and that White Division was honored last year for completing three consecutive years without an accident.