114 Future Physicians Begin Studies at Duke

school applications this year or more than 37 applications for each of the 114 available positions. The students finally selected represent 56 colleges, 26 states, Washington, D.C., and Hong Kong.

Thirty North Carolinians are in the class, and there are 35 women, he said. Twenty-seven students earned their undergraduate degrees at Duke.

Class Statistics

Other statistics show that 13 students are the children of Duke medical alumni, and eight members of the new class have enrolled in the Medical Scientist Training Program which enables them to earn both M.D. and Ph.D. degrees in one of the basic sciences in six to seven years.

Forty-five per cent of the freshmen are receiving some financial aid, according to financial aid coordinator Nell Andrews. A few can expect to accumulate over $20,000 in loans during their medical educations.

Current estimates are that it will cost the School of Medicine in excess of $130,000 to educate each of the students through four years, and the students will pay less than one sixth of that amount in tuition.

The remainder of the school's annual operating budget is made up from agencies sponsoring various research, training and service programs, endowment, contributions from Duke physicians' private practice, private philanthropy, federal and state capitations and university support.

Nursing School Appoints Two

University Provost Frederic N. Cleaveland has announced two appointments to the faculty of the School of Nursing.

Appointed assistant professors were Martha Ann Greene and Catherine Gutmann.

Greene earned B.S.N. and M.Ed. degrees from the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, in 1968 and 1971, respectively, and was an instructor in the nursing school there 1968-70 and 1972-73. She was awarded an M.S.N. from Duke in 1976.

A 1966 graduate of Seton Hall University, Newark, N.J., Gutmann was granted an M.P.H. in 1970 by the University of Michigan School of Public Health. She was assistant professor of community health nursing (graduate section) at Boston College prior to joining the Duke faculty.
