Players Win Praise From Drama Critic

The Elon Players, with their presentation of the modern version of "Antigone", which was presented in Mooney Chapel Theatre as the first offering of the 1968-69 campus dramatic season, won high praise from Jim McAllister, who is the entertainment editor of the Greensboro Daily News.

The Greensboro dramatics editor, after viewing the Player presentation of Sophocles' ancient Greek classic, noted the anti-war declarations of Jean Anouilh's modern French version of the old Greek play. In his review of the Elon Player production, McAllister had the following to say:

The Elon College Players opened their production of the Anouilh "Antigone" in Mooney Little Theater Friday night. The play was repeated Saturday night and another performance was scheduled for Tuesday night, October 22nd.

Director Sandy Moffett brought the play right up to 1968. Glenda Condon, as Antigone, wore the clothes that these days are associated with hippies -- the heavy shawl, the tight jean pants, the shirt-tail out, and the bare feet.

Her fiance, Ismene, played by Marty Lee, came out in Nehru jacket and medallion -- the New Generation look.

The guards wore paratrooper uniforms, complete with scarves and jump boots. The music was contemporary folk-rock.

In this setting there was no mistaking the intent of Antigone's biting words as she berated her uncle, King Creon, for killing her brother and putting his body out to be eaten by buzzards.

She branded Creon and his guards murderers for killing people just because the laws of the state command them to. She was the voice of the idealistic young and he was the Establishment.

Though her diction was not as clear as it might
