A CANDID CHAT WITH CHANCELLOR LYONS

EDITOR'S NOTE: Voice staff writer Clararene Jacobs recently interviewed FSU Chancellor Charles "A" Lyons, Jr. and received a candid insight of the man in charge of Fayetteville State University. The following is the result of the interview.

VOICE: In your opinion, what should be the priorities of a person in life?

CHANCELLOR: The priorities of a person in life should be to establish some goals and objectives in life, develop for himself or herself a value system or a value structure to undergrid not only the eventual goal but also the process that is set in motion to reach those goals that one sets for himself or herself.

VOICE: What is your philosophy of education?

CHANCELLOR: I believe my philosophy of education—matter of fact, I know, is education has a responsibility of not only helping an individual to develop those skills, but to develop knowledge in specialized subject matter fields in order to help a person to get into the world of work. Also, I think education has to, if it's going to really effective, help the individual with the views of other people and the cultures of other people, recognizing the fact that we have all kinds of people in this world and helping people not only to be successful in the world of work, but in the world of human affairs.

VOICE: What kind of relationship do you perceive between yourself and the students here at FSU?

CHANCELLOR: I perceive a very good relationship. Though I think the opportunity for interchange with students does not come as readily and as frequently as I would like for it to come. For the simple reason that a person in this kind of position (as Chancellor) is spread so thin and you have so many demands on your time until it's very difficult to spend as much time talking with students as you would like to spend talking with them. I would hope that the way we are structured this year, that we would get more opportunity for more interaction and interchange with students. With the demands of the university insofar its general administration and the demands of report-production, demands coming from the requirement for planning as a part of the state system of higher education and related to the involvement of this institution, just spreads you over a large landscape. And, it does not leave a great deal of time to do some of the things that you would rather do.

VOICE: Was becoming a university Chancellor a life goal of yours?

CHANCELLOR: No, it was not. I sort of backed into this kind of work. As a matter of fact, I sort of backed into administration. My goal, early in life was to become a lawyer. After college I decided to go on for a master's degree because I felt that a master's degree would be much more marketable than the bachelor's degree which I had at that time. My thought was to go on for the master's degree and teach for a while and then go to law school, once I'd earned enough money to do that. I got into

FSU HOMECOMING PLANS SET FOR OCT. 18

Plans for 1975 Homecoming activities at Fayetteville State University are in high gear and according to chairwoman L. J. Taylor, everything is moving on schedule for what is expected to be one of the best homecoming affairs ever at FSU.

The theme for 1975 homecoming is "Century of Service". FSU, founded in 1877, will celebrate its centennial year in 1977.

Activities begin October 13 and continue through Saturday, October 18 when the FSU Broncos host arch-rival Winston-Salem State University in the annual homecoming contest.

Queen Elizabeth Jones, Miss Homecoming of 1975, will be crowned October 14, during Coronation ceremonies on campus. Miss Jones is a senior sociology major from Ridgeland, South Carolina.

Other activities planned for the week include movies, talent shows, dances, and alumni gatherings.

The homecoming parade will be held Saturday morning October 18 and bands from in and around North Carolina have been invited. There will also be floats, official cars, drill units and beautiful girls in the parade.

Newbold Lab School Comes Down

One landmark building on the Fayetteville State University campus is being demolished because of safety measures. The Newbold Training School was completed in 1930 with sixteen classrooms, six laboratory practice teaching rooms, library, auditorium-gymnasium, and a cafeteria. It was the culmination of long and patient effort of Mr. N.C. Newbold and Dr. E. E. Smith to obtain the school whereby students majoring in elementary education would have a laboratory school to apply the theories and concepts gained through their college courses. The school was named for Mr. N.C. Newbold, state director of Negro education. Funds were received from several sources to support the school: the Rosenwald Fund, General Education Board of North Carolina, State Appropriations, City of Fayetteville, Federal Grants, and community contribution.

The Newbold Training School provided opportunities for thousands of students and hundreds of future teachers to gain an education and engage in real classroom experiences during its existence. Several capable administrators and instructors served at the school and left to make enviable records in the field of education and other endeavors. Many Fayetteville residents, FSU alumni, former students, and friends have asked what will be located on the site? Current plans indicate that a new science building might be erected or the area could be used to enlarge space for the rapidly developing early childhood education program. Whatever is placed on the site, many hundreds will continue to hold fond memories of Newbold Training School.
