What's An Advisor?

What does a student organization expect from its advisor? And when does an advisor become an authoritative meddler?

A survey of residence hall governments taken by a task force of the American College Personnel Association reveals some student thoughts about what an advisor's role should be.

"It is undemocratic and manipulative for an advisor to exert any influence on a residence hall government?" There were differences of opinions on that question, with 59 percent disagreeing, 25 percent agreeing and the rest neutral. Likewise, there was no overwhelming consensus to the statement, "The advisor should be seen and not heard. He should be available if asked for advice but should otherwise keep out of the group's affairs." Fifty-three percent disagreed with the statement, 27 percent agreed and the rest were neutral.

To the statement, "Activities must originate within the government as a result of student need and creativity and not be advisor originated or stimulated," surprisingly perhaps, only 19 percent agreed and 60 percent disagreed.

Another statement with which the surveyed students showed a less than clear consensus: "An advisor should direct a government's group process consciously toward specific destinations" (roughly a 50-50 split between agreement and disagreement).

The residence halls leaders ranked these functions most important for their advisor:

1. Provide advice when called upon.
2. Teach techniques of good leadership and followship.
3. Provide continuity with the tradition and history of the group.
4. Help members develop self-discipline and responsibility.
5. Prevent the group from breaking university rules.
6. Supply to the organization information, expert knowledge, and insights gained through experience.

Most of the functions students least expected from their advisors had to do with initiating activities, as opposed to assisting in student-initiated projects. National On Campus Report.

H.L. Cook

have pepsi or coke for lunch and dinner because their soda machines have to be disconnected to cut down on expenses. These schools, FSU, are state supported but we are fortunate enough to be able to drink coffee, tea, and many other beverages without limitation. It is high time we stop knocking H.L. Cook and started appreciating it. Like Diana Ross, H.L. Cook is also coming out!

While at FSU, Mr. Hopkins plans to work on a terminal degree, his immediate plans are to attend UNC-CH on a part-time basis to begin work on his PH.D.

Along with Mr. Hopkins, FSU secured the services of six other full-time faculty members. Dr. Joshua Atah, a native of Nigeria, recently completed requirements to receive his PH.D. from Duke University. He is an assistant professor in the Division of Business and Economics. Mr. James Reid will also offer his expertise to the Division of Business and Economics. Mr. Reid is the former owner of Commercial Accounting & Tax Services in Durham, N.C.

An addition to the Division of Humanities and Fine Arts is Mr. Jon Young. A native North Carolinian, Mr. Young expects to receive his Ph.D. in August of this year from Florida State University.

Mr. Chester Goodwin, formerly a loan officer with BB&T Bank in Fayetteville, has joined the staff of the Division of General Studies. Dr. Ellis Hudson will teach ecology in the Division of Physical and Life Sciences. A native of Indiana, Dr. Hudson was previously an environmental specialist with the Kentucky Department of Natural Resources. Mr. Adam Simmons, an Alabama native, joined the Division of Social Sciences as a philosophy instructor. Mr. Simmons worked for the Internal Revenue Service as a tax examiner before coming to FSU.

There were other African and Japanese entrees such as Shtonoka Okoshi, Shoga Iri Sengei, Okoshi, shrimp flavored chips, Kuro oni Karinto and Kinsuzu Kasutera.

Appreciation goes out to the users: Linda Jones, Shirley Long, Shirley Wallace and Elzenia Baldwin. Dormitory supervisors: Ms. Mae Rather, Ms. Janie Nettles, and Ms. LaVerne Barnes were satisfied with this sort of program and hopes for another one of its kind in the future.
