Garlic may lengthen life

Campus Digest News Service

It may not do much for your social life, but eating a lot of garlic could help lengthen your lifespan.

Research has shown that garlic, along with ginger and barley, can help reduce atherosclerosis, which are fatty deposits in the arteries that lead to heart diseases.

Three nutritionists from the University of Wisconsin have found that garlic, ginger and barley added to diets reduced the amount of cholesterol buildup in animals. If the same theory can be applied towards humans, it may be easier to control cholesterol levels, thereby reducing the risk of heart disease.

Counterfeit proofing jeans

Campus Digest News Service

Levi Strauss is making a move to crack down on counterfeit Levis jeans.

A new tagging program will allow manufacturers to check goods in stores to see if they are authentic name-brand merchandise.

The tags contain invisible fibers that can be checked against a central computer bank. The tag cannot be duplicated by counterfeiters. Levi Strauss is hoping the new-system will help crack down on the huge name brand counterfeiting industry.

I Was Asked of Appearance

I was looked upon and asked of appearance. Shall I begin with what one see's or with what one displays?

On seeing, it is known that good can be seen as evil and evil seen as good through the eye of many.

Some things are seen and still not believed to be so and altered in order to display what one wants to be seen.

So, what of the display? At times it does not matter what I decide to appear as. My true being always comes through. But when this being is displayed, my appearance is said to be the other.

When I'm asked of appearance, I wonder what is hoped to be seen.

Then, I look, I smile, and I say, appearance is what one wants to see and what one needs things to be.

Know Me

Know me, I've come and I've gone;
Know me, I've laughed, I've mourned;
Know me, I was taught, I was scorned;
Know me, I'm life, Therefore I'm capable.

Buy Now And Later

Something new has been added to the retail shelves of America.

You can walk into a Safeway supermarket and leave with not only milk, carrots and a can of soup, but also with a home computer. Or you can buy your unit at Macys or K-Mart or Bloomingdales. Home computers can be found just about everywhere.

Computer manufacturers, however, are hoping they will be found by the millions under Christmas trees their year. That is what they were planning on when several of the big home-computer makers started cutting prices on their least, expensive models this fall.

Texas Instruments, which has 23 percent of the home computer market, initiated the price war as early as August when it offered a $100 rebate on its TI-99/4A.

Other companies quickly followed the example and cut at their price tags, such as Commodore, Timex, Radio Shack and even Atari. As a result, more than 1.5 million computers are expected to be sold this year. That is far leap from the 35,000 sold in 1980.

Of course, the prices this year have been the market booster. Two years ago the Texas Instruments TI-99/4A was listed at $1,000. It now sells for $299.

Home-computer makers are stressing the low price in retail stores and in advertising. Their message is: why buy just a video game when you can get a home computer for about the same price?

The Voice staff wishes you a safe and happy holiday.

The sales pitch had been effective and may mean a sharp drop off in home video games which soared to their peak last Christmas. Those games now retail for anywhere between $125 and $300.

Home computers can provide the games plus practical uses such as bookkeeping, investment, language learning and more. Some predict that computers will eventually let consumers bank and shop at home.

That means more money for the home-computer manufacturer. Many of those companies were able to slash the prices on their home units because they know once people have the basic unit they will be back to buy more.

The basic unit is usually just a computer keyboard console. Of course, a special video screen or television set is needed to show what the keyboard is doing. And software programs are a necessity. Then there are the accessories- printers, power cords, memory boosters or telephone links.

Accessory and additional component sales are what the computer companies are banking on. They have just set out their bait of an inexpensively-priced unit.

For every $1 a consumer spends on an inexpensive keyboard console, he could spend another $1 on all the extras. Next year he will have more to choose from and software accessories could cost him $2 or $3 for every $1 he spends on a basic unit.

Shoplifting survey

Campus Digest News Service

Subtle security apparently is more effective in deterring shoplifters, according to a study conducted by a marketing professor, Dr. Michael Mills, of the University of Southern California.

Dr. Mills surveyed shoppers and stores in Pittsburgh. His findings show shoppers to be greatly offended by blatant security measures. Those stores which utilized uniformed detectives, chains-linking expensive garments, or electronic tags on items, reported the highest incidence of shoplifting.

Mills believes that shoppers are angered by the obvious trust that the blatant security devices imply. They also may feel challenged by the greater risk involved. He advises shopowners to use more subtle security measures to help deter theft.
