Continuing in the same vein, Akbar stressed that black people should celebrate themselves. He said it's great if blacks put up poster of Malcolm X, W.E.B. Du Bois, Marcus Garvey, and others. However, blacks should celebrate cultural events as well, such as Kwanzaa, an afrocentric alternative to Christmas. Akbar said that as long as black children think that a Santa Claus of another race will bring them a "choo-choo train", then they will develop a slave mentality to celebrate the power structure of another race of people.

Dr. Akbar concluded his presentation by acknowledging love between a man, woman, and family. Responding to questions from the audience, Akbar addressed concerns about the success of blacks in economics by citing the historical examples of Elijah Muhammad and Madame C.J. Walker.

Dr. Na'im Akbar is a research assistant in Clinical Psychologist at Florida State University. He's a graduate of the University of Michigan and a member of the National Association of Black Psychologists. He's been commended for his lectures in colleges and settings all over the world. His views have been expressed in his appearances on "The Phil Donahue Show", "The Oprah Winfrey Show", "The Geraldo Show", and "Tony Brown's Journal".
