

Five Students Nabbed in Milner Playboy Sting

In a case that threatens to stir bitter controversy on campus, five students are being brought before the Judicial Board after college authorities discovered a copy of the February Playboy Swimsuit Issue in a room where the students had been having a party. The students have been charged under the so-called "Respect for Persons" clause with "possession and/or using a smutty magazine" and "perpetuating society's obsessions with bathing beauties."

Junior James Bakker, one of the accused students, agreed to tell his side of the story on the condition that his name not be used.

"Me and a few of my buddies were just sitting around acting innocent when the campus police burst in," he said. "They told us they knew we had smut in the room, and they rummaged through all our stuff. They found this magazine, but I swear I didn't have the faintest idea it was there."

Richard Pryer, the assistant dean for judicial affairs, refused to answer questions about the case on the grounds that his answers might tend to incriminate him.

Testy Bonsai, a member of the Judicial Board, was more forthcoming.

"This case merely emphasizes the need for more severe punishment for students caught reading Playboy, Hustler or Penthouse," she said. To illustrate her point, Bonsai took out a miniature guillotine about six inches tall and with a very sharp blade. "I have submitted a plan to Senate to deal with male students who read smutty magazines."

As a demonstration, she triggered the release on the blade, causing it to slam down on the miniature chopping block.

Eric Bongtree, a self-proclaimed expert on human rights and all-around pain in the butt, was asked about his views of the case.

(During the interview, Bongtree took frequent drags from what he called "The Mother of All Joints.")

"Like, wow, man, this case is a very serious violation of human rights," he said.

"The college has violated these students' rights as granted by The U.S. Constitution, the U.N. Charter, the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and 'Free to Be You and Me' by Marlo Thomas.

"To exhibit my superior learning," he continued, "I will quote to you from the great Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who said, 'If a guy wants to ogle some chick in a scanty bathing suit, he has the right to do so.'"

When The Goofordian contacted Keir Turkey, a clean-living, right-thinking advocate of law and order who serves in Community Senate and supports the college's position in this case, Turkey's "legislative assistant" who answered the phone said he was recovering from "The Mother of All Hangovers," but was authorized to speak on his behalf.

"There's been a lot of talk about how the college is talking illegal shortcuts to convict students on the basis of inadequate evidence," said Turkey's spokesman spokesperson. "That's a lot of bull. I don't see any reason why we should coddle criminals just because they're innocent."

If convicted, the students could be sentenced to listen to Randy Travis records for upwards of eight straight hours.

Three people were eaten by Dana Auditorium yesterday, causing pandemonium across campus. To the surprise of several unsuspecting students, the building doors turned to jaws and the pillars peered angrily down on the awaiting victim.

"I just couldn't believe it," said junior Barny Gornoff. "I was waiting out front for my friend to turn in her paper and all of the sudden she was screaming for help."

No one has yet explained how the building could do such a thing or why, but students are coming up with their own theories.

Freshman Marsh Hipster said, "I think that the ghost that has haunted the building for so long is finally becoming upset with the students." Sophomore Bob Direct said, "It's the beginning of the end."

The religion department refused to comment. The administration, on the other hand, reported that they are sorry for the students, but that it is too late to refund student's tuitions to their families. The Admissions Office is concerned that this event will result in a decline in next year's enrollment and has taken the building off the perspective student touring route.

At the present time the college had issued no official statement. Campus Minister Max Carter has announced that there will be a student support group meeting next Friday for friends of the victims.

how Monty hates to look out the window and see ragged grass. Oh, and you and Nancy need to check that air conditioning unit in Bryan again. They say it's still leaking and blowing out blue stuff."

(At press time, the unit had been repaired, but the water pipes servicing Bryan Hall were shattered in the process, prompting the Board of Trustees to raise tuition another 9.5 percent. According to Newlin, Bryan residents can expect to be without water for "about two more weeks, all right? We're working on it! Just get off our backs. Sheesh!")

Students' reactions have also been mixed. "I knew something was up when I went into the lounge this afternoon and no one was watching soap operas," said junior Jennifer Crackash. "I guess it's good from a financial point of view, but I'm

Senator's Notebook

Mint-flavored or cherry? Prickly or tickly? These are some of the meaty issues senators were probing into deeply last week, as the discussion swung to a request for condom funding.

This discussion had been left dangling after a hot debate last semester, but arose again and was finally resolved. After extended discussions, Community Senate approved the request, prompting the Board of Trustees to raise tuition another 9.5 percent.

Concerned students made penetrating comments about the decision. "This means there's no money left to fund my club, but at least [Senate] didn't leave us hanging like last time," concluded a dejected Rod Limpley. Rod heads the newly-formed Guilford Ball Club, whose membership has swelled this year.

"For some, our decision may come as one that's hard to swallow, but we're firm in our commitment to providing condoms for all students," gushed Budget Committee member Richard Longly. "It'll be great."
