Guilford grad M.L. Carr now Celtics coach

TIM FORBES
staff writer

In May of this year, Guilford graduate and co-captain of the 1973 NAIA National Championship team, M.L. Carr was named head coach of the NBA's Boston Celtics.

Carr, who is Vice President of Basketball Operations for the Celtics, with the approval of the Celtic's owner named himself coach earlier this summer. Although he has a strong history with the Celtics, Carr is receiving strong criticism from the Boston media.

Carr's former Guilford coach, Jack Jenson, had this to say: "People have doubted him for as long as I have known him. He has far surpassed what people have expected him to do."

Criticism and rejection are nothing new to Mr. Carr. Early in his professional career he was cut by the ABA's Kentucky Colonels. He was forced to sell cars while playing in the Eastern League in Pennsylvania.

Things changed for the better as he was named to the All-Defensive team in 1979. Later that year he signed with the Boston Celtics, where he helped win two NBA titles.

Carr has his work cut out for him in Boston. After losing playmaker Dominique Wilkins to an overseas team, Carr is going to have to find a consistent scorer on a team that had a losing record last year.
