

Bauman declared a national disaster area

During a visit to Guilford, President Clinton announces the deployment of the National Guard to help counter "ungodly" new viruses.

KEIR BICKERSTAFFE
lord of funk

On Thursday, March 28, the deadly Ebola virus made its worst advance yet, as it transferred onto the computers of the Bauman Telecommunications Center.

"This is just dreadful. The worst thing ever to happen in the computing field—next to the emergence of Bill Gates as a sex symbol. And right here, in our Bauman. Just awful," said Computer Services worker Teresa Sanford.

Fortunately, the virus loses its biological powers when it enters the computer system. However, the end result is much worse. . . it obtains a vicious sense of humor.

"I was just working on a paper for my music class, comparing the works of Schubert and Schumann. When I printed out, all references to Schubert's piano concertos were replaced by references to Vanilla Ice's "To the Extreme." This [virus] is just inhuman," said first-year student John Cocking.

A Bauman lab... on a good day...

And much to the chagrin of the Guilford community, Ebola isn't the only virus to have gone "cyber." Other diseases include syphilis, emphysema, and gingivitis. One can only imagine what truly vicious effects these have on unsuspecting Bauman occupants.

Gingivitis is one of the viruses which has had the most success in its transformation. It leaves a "horrible, horrible brownish goo" on the base of the keyboard and monitor, according to technical expert Michael McGill, a leading expert in the field of "cyborg'd viruses."

Unfortunately, there is, as yet, no known cure for these viruses other than the burning of Bill Gates in effigy, which seems to placate them for a short time. If you are unfortunate enough to get such a virus, McGill recommends that you "burn Bill Gates dolls in shifts around the clock, or nuke it from orbit—the only way to be sure."

Sara Johnson

CAMPUS NEWS in brief

- The Science Department in conjunction with groundskeeping has proposed to use squirrels for dissection instead of frogs in order to save money and curtail the vast population of these rodents.

- The Quaker yearbook staff has just announced that The Quaker from the school year '94-'95 will be available in the year 2010. See you then.

- Monday night at 8 pm, all the computers in the Mac lab were stolen. When questioned about what happened Security officer Ben Dover said, "I saw some guys loading computers into a white truck, but there were two cars parked illegally that I had to ticket."

- Due to recent damages incurred by ghosts in Dana Auditorium, President Bill Rogers has contacted Dionne Warwick and the Psychic Friends Network to investigate the cause of the ghostly unrest.

• Leigh King

The Community Wreck-ord

the surreal, yet life-threatening tales of community senate

New identity statement up for approval

In an effort to "shake things up," Senate put together a new identity statement for possible approval in May. Striving to interest the student body, the statement hails Quakerism as "totally wack," and reveals the true identity of the Board of Trustees—all departed members of Menudo.

Pet policy to be expanded in halls

Thanks to the Student Residence Committee, there will be an alternative to goldfish for dorm pets next year—llamas. The decision to allow these friendly, furry guys in the dorms has been met with campus-wide praise. Senate is now working out a deal with local farmers to buy the 4 tons of hay and grain necessary.

Student activity fees to fund new organization

The motive of Budget Committee's proposal to raise student activity fees became painfully apparent Wednesday as they announced their plans to donate the extra money to the National Rifle Association. One committee member was quoted as saying, "We Quakers need our guns."

Plans for Dana Lounge revealed

Weeks and weeks of breathless anticipation ended this week when Senate announced their plans for remodeling Dana Lounge—as a state-of-the-art massage parlor. Senators expressed a certain, umm, delight upon the passage of the motion, stating that "it will be a sincerely, umm, helpful step in increasing, umm, enrollment. Yeah, enrollment."

MARKERS FOUND!

In a dramatic speech that left virtually all Senators in tears, Wolf Melbourne announced the recovery of the markers lost at the Student Loan Fund Auction. It seems that the markers had fallen down a local well, and remained there without food and water for over a month. Local citizens became curious when they smelled fumes emanating from the well. The local fire department worked non-stop for over a day, making sure the well did not collapse on the markers. The markers are now safe and sound in the Senate office.

Credit card maxed out, checking account empty and the parents still fuming from the last time you begged for cash?
No problem.

PLASMA FOR BOOKS!

Just come to the Underground to meet the friendly folks of the N.C. No Cross chapter. You'll receive a credit of $100 per pint. And please, leave your garlic necklaces at home.

The Guilford College
BOOKSTORE

You're bloody right we're good!

The Bookstore is not liable for any dizziness, nausea, fang marks, or tetanus incurred.

If you have any comments or concerns, you should, like, umm, do something about it.