That's a grand total of over $15,000. The drinks you bought at happy hour won't seem like such a bargain if you're charged with drunk driving. A level of .08-.10 per cent BAC ensures that your license will be revoked. You will lose your driving privileges for up to a year, and getting them back involves re-taking the written exam as well as the road test. And you could wind up in jail.

The day began gray and wet. At 9:30 on a Saturday morning, the campus looked as lifeless as it sounded. Walking up the path to Founders, it seemed that not even the squirrels had decided to climb out of bed yet. At the door, however, there was an unexpected display of color: balloons and a multi-colored sign proclaiming, "Kidfest—Registration Inside."

Within a few minutes, the place began to be overrun by volunteers blowing up balloons and, during the next hour, dozens of kids arrived to participate in the first-ever Guilford Kidfest, held on April 6.

The children, numbering almost 50, came from six Guilford tutoring sites all across Greensboro: Pathways, American Friends Service Center, English as a Second Language at Spanish Church, National Black Child Development, Westview and Silverbriar Elementary schools. About 30 volunteers worked to provide a day of activities for the group, which was diverse in both ages and backgrounds.

"The youngest was five, the oldest was 14," said Kidfest organizer Kris Belmonte. "We weren't sure how age-appropriate the games would be, but it all worked out great."

In fact, cooperative games involving the entire group proved to be the favorite of several volunteers and organizers. Following the cooperative games, the children were allowed to choose from several activities and rotated among different stations. The children ate lunch in the cafeteria, and the usual quiet Saturday brunch was replaced by a hectic group searching out ice-cream cones.

"I think definitely that the unplanned moments were the best. We didn't think it would rain... and didn't expect to be outside, but it went great," commented Erin Seltzer, one of the original organizers and visionaries. Amanda Phillips, a fellow organizer, recounted another unplanned moment—when two children wandered into Coach Ketchum's office and had great fun playing with a 10-pound medicine ball.

Volunteers either took shifts or participated the entire day; in total about 30 volunteers turned out to make Kidfest possible.

"It seemed we were having just as much, or more, fun than the kids," commented one volunteer.

"The volunteer force was very strong," said organizer Kiley Holder. "Everyone did a great job of working together to make the day a success."

Kidfest was planned by a committee known as GUTS—Guilford Uniting Through Service, which is already planning more events for next fall. "We really want to get word out, to have more participation from various aspects of Guilford—faculty, students, and staff. That's why we're Guilford Uniting," said Belmonte.

Phillips articulated the ultimate vision of GUTS, hoping that next year it will become "more of a committee for action and service, constantly planning and putting on events that involve the Guilford community and the greater Greensboro community—creating a link between the two and having that link be service."
