•The author of the golf story was Jesse Laplante not Owen Finberg.

Quakers

tor programs for Guilford and the surrounding community.

In addition, the Center is responsible for the development of Guilford's Quaker Leadership Scholars Program (QLSP). QLSP is described in its statement of purpose as a program which "enables the committed Quaker Student to utilize the rich Quaker resources of the college and wider Friends community to deepen and expand involvement in the Religious Society of Friends."

These programs are just one way Quakerism can be felt in the Guilford community. For the most part, it is the very culture of Guilford which springs from Quaker values. "The clear comfort that this campus has as opposed to other campuses," says Carter, "is deeply rooted in Quaker beliefs in equality."

Sophomore Jenny Craigie, a resident advisor in Binford Hall, agrees. "I feel that the Quaker influence has made me more of a resource and less of a disciplinarian," Craigie said. QLSP participant Hayden Tatman, also a sophomore, feels that Quaker values do pervade the community. "Quakerism at Guilford directly affects only the Quaker students," Tatman said, "but it indirectly affects all the students."

When asked what he thought about the role of Quakerism in the lives of Guilford students, Carter replied, "Guilford is a place where spirituality is taken seriously." He went on to say that, "Many students come to Guilford refugees from religious malpractice." Carter was careful to explain that "Inthy-face Quakerism isn't our style," although many Guilford students do begin attending meetings while at Guilford and continue to do so after they graduate. Carter put it best when he explained "Quakerism at Guilford is more caught than taught."
