North Koreans visit campus

BY MORGAN REFFELL Staff Writer

"The North Koreans are coming!" These words have recently echoed across the Guilford campus. From November fifth until November ninth, Guilford hosted three scholars in an effort to do its part to improve communications between North Korea and the United States. This was one of the first trips that has been taken by any North Koreans that has a primarily educational theme to it. As Guilford President Don McNemar said, "We wanted to move from just the political and sightseeing to more scholarly trips."

In August of 1996, McNemar went with a delegation of Quaker educators to North Korea. This delegation, in cooperation with the American Friends Service Committee, came up with the idea of having a small group of North Korean scholars visit some of the Quaker educational institutions in the United States. Guilford was chosen as one of the schools that this group would visit.

The members of the delegation were Kim Hyong Jun, the head of the delegation and a permanent member of the Korean Committee for Solidarity with the World's People, Ri Yong Son, deputy director of crop production research at the Institute of Agricultural Science, and Tong Kyong, who was the interpreter as well as a member of the Korean Association of Social Sciences. Two of the members of the delegation are interested in intercultural studies and the third is studying agricultural research. Also accompany-ing them was Alice Andrews, international programs assistant at the American Friends Service Committee

The delegation had already made several stops in the United debate between students at the States before coming to North Carolina. The members spent some time in New York at the United Nations, visited Swarthmore in Philadelphia, and even stopped briefly in Washington, D.C. Their time in Greensboro was spent mostly looking at various agricultural techniques and taking a look at Guilford and other colleges in the area. They had a tour of the campus and were introduced at a faculty meeting here, but spent Thursday morning at North Carolina A & T and Friday morning at North Carolina State University in Raleigh. Also on the schedule was a visit to Novartis, a company that makes chemicals for agricultural production.

There are many hopes that this visit by the delegation will be the first of many exchanges between the two participating groups. Eventually there may even be student exchanges between the two countries. One of the main goals of this experiment was to open communications between the academic communities and continuing into the larger spectrum. As Don McNemar said, they were "trying to have honest dialogues, not just prepared speeches."
