Lauren Bluestein. "It showed the people who are not out that we are here and to not feel alone."

Jennings also introduced the movie, Out of the Past, which was shown to the audience.

The movie documents the history of gays and lesbians through the story of Kelli Peterson, a high school student who formed a gay-straight student alliance at her school in Salt Lake City, UT. Local and state authorities passed measures to keep the group from meeting on campus.

Events of GLBT month continued on Saturday with the fourth annual "Coming Out Ball."

"It's a way for the gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender students to get together and feel comfortable," said Co-chair of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender Allies (GLBTA), Daniel Summers. GLBTA is a student group fighting for equal treatment for people of all sexual orientations. The ball, which was attended by students of all sexual orientations, featured music, dancing, and cross-dressing.

"It was a different side of Guilford that isn't shown—a more open side," said second-year student Tristy Everly. "The 'same old, same old' gets old, and it's more diverse, and that what we're trying for."

According to Summers, the purpose of those events and others throughout GLBT month "serves to empower the GLBT community through an increased social presence and show people who we are and what we are about."

Other events of the first week of GLBT month were a pot luck dinner at Kathy Tritschler's home on Oct. 4th, free HIV testing on Oct. 6th, and a GLB-RC open house on Oct. 7.

Events still yet to happen are the National Coming Out Day Coffeehouse on Oct. 11th in the Underground and the "Blast from the Past" events with the alumni over Homecoming weekend.

Summers hopes that in the long run there will be a more allied presence at GLBT events. "Everybody says that they support us, but we don't always feel it," said Summers. "We're all equal, but we're all different."

As Guilford goes through a very difficult curriculum revision many other faculty have discussed the possibility of a pre-law major. Gerlak definitely objects to this idea, worrying that in a "rush to create new things," the college would overlook one important fact: that law schools are not interested in pre-law majors. Most, like Duke, UNC, and Vanderbilt, prefer a strong liberal arts background.

Gerlak recommends classes that involve a lot of writing. Other steps she would like to see would be a smaller version of an option available at many big schools, a test-taking center. Since an entire center devoted to test practice would cost too much, Gerlak would like to see maybe one person, working through the Academic Skills Center who could help students.

ence books. The society also sponsors dinners that usually feature a theme. Last year's theme was "ethics," and a Guilford graduate was invited to speak. According to Gerlak, activities like this provide "good networking." It is an opportunity to look for possible internships and law firm experience.
