US, EU shift biofuel policies

As the United States and European Union start to make good on promises to produce biofuels, even truck manufacturers have followed suit. But the light's not green yet, as humanitarian agencies protest "food for fuel" and a new study in Science magazine has found we could reduce more carbon, have our petrol, and eat it too if we simply reforest instead.

'Curve Ball' behind WMD myth revealed on 60 Minutes

Rafid Ahmed Alwan, also known as "Curve Ball," gave the U.S. government the information needed in 2002 to invade Iraq. His identity has recently been released, along with the reminder that almost every piece of information he provided has since been discredited.

Modern Feminism

"Today's feminists are primarily concerned with ending stereotypes created throughout history and focusing on global issues, asking questions like "Why are women stereotyped as nurturers and men as breadwinners?"
