

Bryan Relaxation Space to replace totally lame Hut

Guilford President and Professor of Political Science Kent Chabotar announced the construction of the Joseph M. Bryan Jr. Relaxation Space on Friday, March 15. Construction began Saturday, March 16.

"The Bryan family has been so generous to Guilford, and as long as Joe keeps giving us money, we are delighted to have their name adorn our campus in any way possible as much as humanly possible," Chabotar said via email interview.

Bryan gifted $11.2 million exclusively for construction of the Relaxation Space, the newest in a recent string of architectural improvements on campus. Planned features for the three-story facility include a solarium, a billiards room, two coffee shops and an indoor Chick-fil-A.

"I'm totally excited about (the Joseph M. Bryan Jr. Relaxation Space)," said first-year Nicole Tomlin. "I think it will make Guilford seem more modern, and it will attract new students to our school."

"I heard there was going to be a heated swimming pool," Tomlin added. "I think that would be swag as hell."

The Relaxation Space straddles Quadrangle Drive, and plans call for a footbridge connecting Bryan, Shore and Founders Hall. Also, its massive size requires the demolition of The Hut, which occurred on the second day of construction.

The Hut will be replaced by the Joseph M. Bryan Jr. Koi Pond and Fountain.

"The Hut as we know it has ceased to exist, but we are relocating it," said Vice President for Student Affairs Aaron Fetrow via phone interview.

"Though the Bryan Relaxation Space is opulent, we want to keep Guilford's Quaker tradition intact, and part of that tradition is testifying to simplicity. So while the original Hut is gone, we're keeping the idea of The Hut going."

Since Bryan reserved his endowment expressly for the construction of the Relaxation Space, no funds were allocated to build a new Hut in its zoned location between the lake and Nathan Hunt Road, soon to be Joseph M. Bryan Jr. Road.

Design plans for the Joseph M. Bryan Jr. Relaxation Space have already been made; above is the rendered version for the first floor.

Campus Ministry Coordinator Max Carter and Initiative-Faith & Practice Gifts Discernment Coordinator Frank Massey have funded the project themselves.

"We've been digging for the past week and a half for about twelve hours a day, but to us it's worth it," said Massey. "We've researched Vietnamese tunneling techniques and bought a bunch of lumber, and we're really making some progress. We even came up with a nickname for it: The Hutch. Max came up with it."

"I'm just glad they let us keep the piano," said Carter. News of The Hut's relocation sparked mixed opinions from students.

"It's so far away now, and that pisses me off," said senior Ted Jarvis. "I used to go to The Hut all the time, and now I've got to walk all that way to bone without kicking my roommate out." "I always thought it was really stupid," said sophomore Dalton Plumlee. "I mean, what did people do in there anyway, sing hippie songs?"

Though forced from his traditional headquarters for the betterment of the campus, Carter expressed his happiness over the Bryan Relaxation Space and remains in good spirits.

"You can call me Mr. Dig-Hole, but don't call me Maxxy C," Carter said as he smudged his beard with red clay while wiping sweat from his face.

BREAKING NEWS UPDATE: College will officially change name to Joseph M. Bryan Jr. University in the Fall.

We at The Bike Shoppe are "glad" to hear about the capture of the tire-slasher and invite you to bring the last of your slashed tires here for repair!

Hours
Mon, Wed, Fri
1-5 a.m.

Manager's Note:
There have been allegations lately claiming The Bike Shoppe is the culprit of the tire-slashing, and we are happy to be "rightfully" proven innocent. However, should P-Safe have messed up, don't forget we're always here to make repairs!

Akins solves tire-popping case

"I walked outside, and there it sat: my bike with its tires slashed," said Guilford College Assistant History Professor and avid bike rider Damon Akins. "It looked like something you would see on a Lifetime movie."

Akins is not the only one experiencing the pain of a slashed tire. Many students have been coming forward all year reporting bike-tire slashings all around campus.

Junior Mike Hawk says after a long night of doing work in Bauman, he came out to find his bike with both tires sliced open.

Luckily, it did not take long for the criminals to be caught.

After a thorough investigation, Public Safety and the Greensboro Police Department uncovered the culprit.

Bryce Barrows, the head of the campus Bike Shop, confessed to coming up with the plan. Barrows said that with the bad economy, he had to figure out a way to generate business for the struggling shop.

Barrows also confessed that he had accomplices in these horrific crimes: James Shields, director of the Bonner Center for Community Learning, and Kent Chabotar, professor of political science and president of Guilford College.

When Shields was asked to comment on the investigation he had this to say, "You can call me crap hole, just don't call me a criminal."

The criminals are facing up 45 hours of community service. Akins believes this punishment isn't severe enough for the crime.

"Sometimes in situations like this you have to take the law into your own hands," said Akins.

Akins set out on a journey to take justice into his own hands. He knew he could not correct this injustice on his own, so Akins decided to ask Assistant Professor of History Phil Slaby, who is known for his infamous death stare and ruthless teaching practices.

"If looks could kill, Phil Slaby would be a mass murderer," said Professor of German Dave Limburg.

After much deliberation, Slaby and Akins decided the best punishment for Chabotar and Shields would be to serve a semester in Slaby's Europe in Revolution history class.

"It's an ugly beast of a class, and I would not wish that punishment on my worst enemy," said sophomore Carmelitha Whitlock-Almond.

When it came to Barrows, Slaby and Akins knew that the punishment had to be brutal for him to fully understand what he had done. They knew who they had to see, the man that decides everything on campus, Director of Friends Center and Campus Ministry Coordinator Max Carter.

"We walked into The Hut and there sat Carter, pipe in mouth and hot tea in hand," said Slaby.

They explained the situation to Carter, and after three calm sips of the tea and two drags of the pipe, Carter came up with the perfect punishment for Barrows.

Barrows will spend the rest of his time at Guilford locked in the basement of the library, grading Slaby's and Akins' history papers.
