

Injuries Plague Stars As Sports Event Looms

Wails and moans fill the soft spring breezes of Salem campus. Occasionally a shriek of anguish send a shiver through the willow tree in front of Bitting. The lily pond is overflowing with the tears of all Salem occupants. "What has happened?" Miss Stout shakes her head in reply. She cannot trust herself to speak. A frog leaps up from the side of the pond and croaks. "I just can't stand any more. All this crying and all over a silly basketball game between the faculty and students of this college."

"Well, why is Seville crying over by the swimming pool then, Frog? As manager of the Know-Nothings she should be happy to see the opposing team in bad shape."

"You don't understand," said the frog impatiently. "With Stone in crutches, Watkins wearing bandages, Bullock in the hospital, Taylor in stitches, and Meatball not eating, their team is not in the best possible spirits. By the way, why are you asking me all this?"

"Why shouldn't we?" "Because I've been coaching McEwen and Campbell in the art of good cheer leading, and I'm losing my voice. So long. Don't Forget Thursday night in the gym at 8

"Breathes there a man with soul so tough
Who says two sexes are not enough?"

This poet should have been introduced to Miss Neely's Advanced Botany class to hear about one such plant with not one sex, but ten sexes. . . . five male and five female. This dizzying peculiarity has an equally dizzying name—Chlamydomonas—all of which adds up to a most confused situation.
