

RUNAWAYS

Red lights and heavy traffic separated Harvey Bissette's and W.R. Parson's cars near Philadelphia. As three of the girls were standing on the sidewalks to flag Harvey down, a policeman, heard their North Carolina accent and asked were they runaways. When they said, "No," he then asked what they were doing so far away from home and learned that they were on their way to the convention.

RECOGNIZING N. C. ACCENT

It seems that everywhere the group went, as soon as they spoke, people knew they were from North Carolina. "Does it show that bad?" queried one of the girls after a number of such experiences.

"RUGGED" WALKING

Tripping merrily down the steps of the Columbia library after learning of the Bugle's success, Mrs. Lassiter knocked her shoe heel completely off. Replacing it the best she could, she walked on down the street. Seeing some carpenters working on one of the Columbia buildings, she halted the work, asking the men to do her a bit of service - nail her heel on. While two were hammering away, she held her breath for fear that her new shoes would be scarred.

BLISTERS

A frantic search for fruit was made by two of the girls after slipping out of the hotel at bedtime in Washington, D. C. The results were blisters on the back of their heels and Mrs. Farmer's catching them before they could get their hats off. Did they learn the truth of the statement: "Be sure your sins will find you out"!!

CALLED DOWN

After seeing a good show one night the girls on the sixth floor went to their rooms to retire. When they got off the elevator someone asked them about a girl being strangled in another hotel (joke). While they were talking the elevator stopped at their floor, and the elevator boy said, "Are you going up or down?" "Going neither way" one of the girls replied, "We're going sideways". This infuriated the elevator man and up came the manager asking, "Don't you think it's about time to go to bed?" That ended that conversation.
