

The Teen-Ager Speaks ----- La Rue Winstead

When I started thinking about this month's column, a friend suggested that I write of the awkwardness of the teen-ager.

Learning to act grown-up is like learning to skate or dance. We are self-conscious at first, and it takes a while to develop self-confidence, self-control. But confidence will come by degrees if we realize that everybody is clumsy sometimes. Try to be more thoughtful, appreciative, and helpful. That way, we forget ourselves and make others like us better.

When at a party, keep busy; help in the kitchen, girls; pass the potato chips and eat some yourself! When we make boners, laugh and forget them. Everyone else makes boners of his own, and if he has a sense of humor, he has as much fun at his own expense as anyone else does.

A laugh, like a disease, is contagious. Try catching it!

Bulletin Boards Challenge Thanksgiving Spirit

Pictures on the library board reflect a bit of early American history.

Let your eyes follow this course as soon as you have a moment free from study. Begin in the upper right corner of the black board and behold a small home nestled beside a leafless tree. Farther down is a small church and still lower a building that would be a school to one person and a fort to another.

Changing directions and going upward, we observe four books being judged by a turkey. In the top left corner is a picture representation of the Pilgrims getting ready for Thanksgiving.

Clara Lou Stott made the drawings, and Wayne Lamm applied some of the colors. Eunice Perry
