

Students Busy Writing; U.S. History Reviews War

Learning to write through practice is consuming much of the time of English I and II classes as this reporter gleaned information from the teacher, Miss Idalia Oglesby. Following exams the United States history students will be busy with the Civil War, she continues.

The English I B students have been studying the eight parts of speech and their uses in sentences. They are ready to attempt some creative writing on familiar topics. Reading and discussing biographical sketches of famous people is the topic in literature.

'DRIFTWOOD' WRITING

Miss Oglesby further related that creative writing through the process called "Driftwood," because some paragraphs were ordinary, while others were outstanding, has consumed much of the English I A students' time. In the new semester she plans themes, stories, and an occasional essay to replace the short paragraphs. Biography will be the center of literary interest for this group.

The sophomore English students will begin their new
