There are a few Bailey students who are fooling themselves into thinking that they are clever by skipping school.

Why should they be in school? They would accomplish more at school; besides, this absence is an unexcused one. One day's absence really means two days of nonpreparation and low grades. Most important, such students develop habits that will not be tolerated on a job.

The purpose of school is to train young people for their step into the future and to help them build habits and attitudes that will be an asset in later life, but the school cannot accomplish its goal when a student is not present.

What Are The Answers To Failing Grades

Champions in extracurricular activities, yet failures in school subjects. That is the picture of many Bailey students as reported on page 18.

Why?

Is it indifference on the part of the student? Is it lack of inspiration from parents? Is it the result of uninteresting classes? Not altogether, for in many cases some of the best students are failing, while students of the same or less ability, sitting on the same class, are making average grades.

Again why? Do the failing students work so hard at outside activities that upon reaching class they relax and fail to give the attention due? Are they putting out enough effort to produce the results they think they deserve? Is failing to budget their time a reason?

WHAT ARE THE ANSWERS? The time has come for many students to decide what the correct answer is before it is too late.
